Clifton read her thought; she feared hat she had escaped one evil only to fall that she had escaped one evil only to fall into a worse one, perhaps.

"Do not fear to trust me," he said, gently, all his noblest sympathies aroused by that look of fear on her face. "I have a dear sister who is just about your age; do not think that I would see you, or any other young girl, in trouble, and not wish to help her? Pray, give me your confidence, and let me do what I can for you. My name is Clifton Vining, and I promise you that I will accord you all the friendliness and respect which I all the friendliness and respect which I should wish given to my sister under similar circumstances," he concluded, with a shudder of horror at the mere thought of Annie ever being found in thought of Annie ever being found in such a terrible extremity.

Could Hamilton Vining have heard these noble words, he might have felt a glow of pride and gratitude in the knowledge that his only son was imbued with these lofty sentiments of honor, which stamped him as one of nature's noblemen; he surely must have felt deeply humiliated in view of his own remissness in not having sought to know his boy more intimately, and thus have been able to help develop more perfectly a character help develop more perfectly a character possessing such elements of nobility. The girl was unmistakably impressed by his words, for she bowed her face upon her hands and burst into nervous weeping.
"Saved!" he heard her murmur with a

He allowed her to weep unrestrained for a few moments, for he thought it might relieve the strain upon her overwrought mental condition.
Presently she became somewhat calm.

Here eyes were large and full, and had an expression of innocence, and the earnest, direct look which one often observes in a child. Her skin was like satin, and her present pallor, caused by the excitement which she had endured, only served to enhance its dazzling fairness. Her features were somewhat irregular, but fraught with an earnestness and intelligence which betrayed a well-cultivated mind. Her lips were vividly red, and very sweet in expression, while the dainty chin curved away into the white neck with a delicacy of outline that was very beautiful.

Her manners were quiet and ladylike, her language exceedingly well chosen, and Clifton was more and more surprised at the fact of having found her in such a locality as Houston street.

"I will prove to you that I am a true and honest man, young lady," he remarked in reply to her observation. "I will not even inquire your name—I will not seek to know how you happened to be driven to such extremity tonight; you shall preserve the secret of your identity and of your, trouble, if you desire; only let me take you to a good woman who will kindly care for you and give you a home as long as you like."

"Who is this woman?" demanded the young girl with breathless eagerness.

"Her name is Abby Knapp, and she is a woman who was my own and my sister's nurse during our infancy and youth," Clifton explained; adding: "She is married, and lives in a quiet, respectable street. Her husband is a decent hack-driver in the city, and she helps to increase their income by doing fine washing and ironing. Abby has the kindest heart in the world, and never refuses to do anything for her nurslings that does not conflict with her ideas of right and wrong, which are somewhat right."

"But what would she think to have me—a young girl, in such a plight—come to her house at this unseasonable hour in the morning?" the beautiful stranger inquired, while a vivid flash of color dyed her face.

"She will think just what is true and what I shall tell her—that you are in trouble, and need help and sympathy."

"But wait a moment, if you please," she added, and with a graceful, backward sweep of her arms she gathered up the wealth of her hair in her hands, and twisted it, into a massive knot at the back of her head, and fastened it with a couple of pins which she found tangled among its golden strands. "If I only had something to put on my head to shield my face," she murmured, with a troubled look and a sensitive blush.

Clifton drew from the pocket of his overcoat a soft, brown felt hat and passed it to her.

"You are very good," the young girl said, appreciatively, "and now, if you please, let us hurry away from this place. I am afraid—I am filled with horror, when I think of all that I have escaped."

With as much courters and respect as With as much courtesy and respect as he would have shown an equal in society, Clifton gave his arm to his companion, and turned toward Broadway.

They had not proceeded many blocks when they encountered a cab returning from a late trip uptown.

Clifton hailed it, and quickly putting his charge within, he told the driver where to take them, and then followed her.

He was very thankful for this unexpectrie was very markful for this unexpected piece of good luck, for, although it was April, the night was damp and chilly, and he feared that his companion, who was thinly clad, might take cold. "No," the young man replied; "she appeared to be so excited, and almost afraid to trust me, that I would not add to her fear by asking her any questions; so, Abby, you will have to find that out for yourself and tell me later," he concluded, smiling, as he arose to go.

New York, March 26 .- Mrs. Martha Dorlon Lowe, the Brooklyn church choir soloist who recently signed a contract to sing in vaudeville, has prought suit against her pastor, Rev. The inspiration of the case is the scathing denunciation of the step taken, made in a sermon preached on the second Sunday following Mrs. Lowe's announcement of her mination. In this, without mentioning her name, the minister pointedly al luded to the fact that a member his choir had "chosen the vaudeville stage in preference to singing the praises of God in the church choir, declared her intention inconsistent with a profession of Christianity, and demanded her resignation from choir

The announcement of her intended as pearance on the vaudeville stage was made on March 3, while her contract with the Church of the Pilgrims does not expire until May 1.
