NOTE FROM THE EDITOR

In late April, the Federal government brought down a budget which will have profound effects upon our foreign and defence policy. The steep reduction in spending levels adds yet another wrinkle to an international agenda for Canada that is undergoing rapid and unprecedented change. For one thing, we have a new and unsettling problem: the enemy refuses to cooperate, as it has unfailingly for forty years, in being menacing and warlike, thus making much more complex the business of formulating a coherent defence and national security policy. For another, it is dawning on just about everybody interested in the subject, that the need to raise living standards in poor countries, the economic and political choices that are made to achieve this goal, and humankind's ability to avoid widespread (perhaps global) ecological disaster, are interconnected in ways we have only just begun to comprehend.

Different parts of all these questions are dealt with in three articles in this issue: Gregory Wirick visited several countries in Central America this spring and brings back a fresh perspective on the problems faced by this war-torn region; Roger Hill sheds light on some not very well-known but potentially very important proposals to further integrate Canada's defence industries with those of the US; and a CIIPS Roundtable features vigorous discussion of our foreign and defence policy in the wake of the April budget.

In addition, Julie Morin takes a look at North Africa's latest experiment in political and economic union; Ted Hopf offers a warning about the Western world's attitude to Gorbachev's overtures; and Clyde Sanger remembers an old friend and eminent Canadian. While Leonard Zamor's letter from Beijing came to us before the beginning of April's momentous events in Tiananmen Square, the political and economic tension which caused the crisis are evident in his acute observations of daily life in the Chinese capital.

The Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security was created by an act of the Parliament of Canada in 1984 to increase knowledge and understanding of the issues relating to international peace and security from a Canadian perspective. The Institute does not advocate policy positions, nor is it part of the government decision-making apparatus. The Institute is a Crown Corporation. Members of its Board of Directors were appointed by the Government of Canada after consultation with all recognized parties in the House of Commons. These provisions help to ensure the independence of the Institute.
