BOOKS ARRIVE FROM CARNEGIE INSTITUTE

More Than Two Hundred Scientific Works Now At Library.

The first shipment of the books presented by the Carnegie Institution of Washington to Western University arrived this week. There are more than 200 volumes of elaborate scientific works, and by the terms of the gift Western will in future receive every publication issued by the institution. As there are less than half a dozen libraries in Canada that are depositories for the Carnegie Institution, the value of the collection that has come to London is apparent.

The bringing of these books to London has been largely due to the efforts of Dr. J. D. Barnett, who has been in communication with the trustees of the Carnegie Institution more than a year ago. Dr. McKibben of the medical school was also able to press the claim on behalf of the medical school, and some time ago the university authorities were notified that their application had been granted. The books received, which are valued at about $1,000, include elaborate researches in the various branches of science, as well as most valuable works in English literature. There is a concordance to the works of Keats, and a concordance to Spencer, a seven-volume work on the Arthurian legends, guides to the historical materials in the archives of European countries, studies of the history of transportation and commerce, sociological inquiries, considerable material on heredity, elaborate mathematical tables, etc.

The co-operation that is working between the various libraries of the city is resulting in great extension of the resources for students and investigators. During the summer Professor James T. Shotwell of Columbia University, who was summering at Stratford, had occasion to make frequent use of the libraries of London in connection with historical work that he was engaged upon. He was enthusiastic in his praise of the resources that were available here, and found in the public library and the university library everything that he needed in the writing that he was doing.

Both the public library and the university library have had the opportunity recently of securing valuable government publications from Ottawa, and several shipments have been received. Filming plans in the sets of government reports.
