I will tell imjust as it happened. I was seventeen years old that very summer, and I had never been anywhere away from home. Father was not rich, and mother had a deal to do, been so innocently contented; and I what with the butter, and the poultry, decided, after two or three sleepless and the children, who must be sent to school, and who were so hard on their clothes. So it happened that I grew clothes. So it happened that I grew up without knowing anything beyond my little home world hedged in but the my little home-world, hedged in by the purple crests of the White Mountains on one side, and the tall, scarlet poppies of the home-garden on the other.

Until one day, Deacon Sedgewick's was picking early strawberries in the and my fingers dyed ruby-red with the "Kitty Kent," said she, in that
