¹For a woman who has been a mother of a nice," complained Mrs. Vermilyes, "I am a martyr." She had done the best she could; she had found the most eligible men in town, and forced them to see Anne in her more favorable lights. Anne let the men see that she regarded them as fools, so they bowed and left her; all except Captain Sloane. Nobody had ever made Captain Sloane. Nobody had ever made Captain Sloane believe that he was regarded as a fool. He thought that Miss Cathcart was laboring under a miser-able miscoaception, and he set about con-verting her to his opinion. "The man is the worst kind of tool," de-cided Anne, "the persistent kind." And daily she dreamed of that picture which caused such and havoc to her a units plans. There aross before her the canvas where poor Tom Anderson had painted the place that appealed to her before all others-the old bridge that led to War-hirst, where she had lived so many orphan days with Annt Susan Vermilyea, till the coal was found on the land her father had left her. The thought of the old picture in the exhibition brought the artist near to her thought; for, with the strokes ot his brush.

The thought of the old picture in the exhibition brought the artist near to her thought; lor, with the strokes of his brush, he had put in the sentiment with which ahe regarded the scene. She remembered many such a morning as the canvas spoke of; cool, with a blue that was more than a blue, the water under the bridge reflecting a perfect sky; there were the bridge-keep-er's ducks in the rank grasses; there was the quaint old cottage, where she had often stopped to rest when she used to take those long quiet walks, during which she had woven the pattern of her life as she would like it to be, and all the joy that would course.

We to be, and an the joy that would come. What joy had come ? Riches had come; and riches had never entered the pattern of her lite, as she wove it out in those old walks. All that was culminated here in the city, where she was courted, feted, a beauty doing as her aunt thought best. Then, three months ago, when she had al-most said "yes" to Captain Sloane, who really appealed to her on account of his magnificent staying-qualities, she must needs see that picture at the exihibition.

But how was it in those lower quarters-those slums? Tom Anderson was inspired by her in-telligence. Mattie, the little school-mistress in Warhirst, did not appreciate his art like this. Mattie was lost in admiration for him, prayed for him, looked up to him as to a god. This other woman-a mondaine, a beauty with great wealth-sought him out and talked to him and understood him. Mattie's weekly letters grew tiresome. to spot. Anis older woman—a moncant, a beauty with great woman—a moncant, mattie's weekly letters grew thresome, her gossip about her homely ways excessive. He did not go to Warhirst, as he had long ago promised he would. Instead, he wrote a rather sharp letter to Mattie, to the effect that ''we poor devise must work, not loaf." Mattie imagined him toiling over '' pot-boilers, 'haggard and going without din-ners, while she wondered, with a pucker between her eyes, how she could help him. When she was in school, she was often cross with the array off future Presidents spread before her, for she was thinking of Tom and improvising harrowing tableaux in which he was the principal figure. She always had one tableau before her.—a long-gone-by Sunday morning, the week before he had begun the bridge picture. That Sunday, he came to the rectory, where she boarded, just as she reached home from church. He stood looking at her, with his hands in his pockets, not saying a word. All at once, he threw his arms toward her. Her eyes brimming, she tound herselt in those arms. "Yes, Tom," she sobbed. And that was their wooing, after months of silent devotion. So, when she received Tom's sharp letter, she was cross with her pupils and worried. Tom was poor! Tom was poor! That rang in her ears. And here was Tom with congenial Anne Cathcart! Anne? Never had such a rest come to her; not since she had become a wealtby

And there was from with congenial Anne Cathcart! Anne? Never had such a rest come to her; not since she had become a wealthy woman had she felt there was truth in the world till now. What if Tom were irre-sponsive? If the fared to avow himself be-cause of her money. Yet she could conquer him: in the matter of that picture, if she forced him to sell it, despite the sentiment he had for it, it would show that she had conquered. What romance made him keep that picture, if there were not a wo-man in it?

WHEN EDISON WAS YOUNG.

The Incident that Led the Way to his Know-ledge of Electricity.

The Incident that Led the Way to his Know-ledge of Electricity. As a newsboy Edison's run took him twice a week through Mount Clemens on the train known as the "mixed" division. This train reached that station between 10 and 11 a.m., and returned to Port Huron between 4 and 5 p. m. Young Edison was popular with the railroad men, whom he delighted to entertain in his train labora-tory with chemical experiments, and had made a staunch friend of the Mount Clem-ens operator. Mr. MacKenzie and his wite and family lived over the station. It was a summer day. The "mixed" ar-rived in good time, and the train was cut loose ahead of the baggräge car in order to pick up a car of freight on its way to Jack-son. This left the passenger and baggrage car at the north end of the station platform. The engine and reight cars backed in on the freight house track and platform. The engine and reight cars backed in on the freight house track was very level. "My son, then two and a halty ears old," said Mr. Mackenzie, "unobserved by his nurse, had strayed upon', the main. track and was amusing himself throwing pebbles, when Edison, who stood near with papers under his arm, turned All saw the child' danger. Throwing aside his papers he plunged between the cars just in time to dra plusned they end with out injury. The act was drag himself and the child clear of the ap-proaching cars. Excepting scratches, both escaped without injury. The act was heroic, and our gratitude was unbounded. I was just then unable however, to sub-stantially reward the young man. Then I remembered his absorbing interest in telegraphy. Many a time I had driven him from the office, for his curiosity led him into all sorts of mischief, to my annoy-ance.

She was so excessively cheerful that her aunt took to shuddering and appealed to Captain Sloane. The captain determined that no nonsense should take Anne from him, and he went to see her so often that she felt as though she were his prisoner, and she tried to tire him with caprices. "But I am sure she admires you," said Mrs. Vermilyea. "I am sure she does," assented the cap-tain. "Girls sometimes act this way when they admire men-fight their own inclina-tions, you know."
