The Shah at the Guildhall—The Ball Room—The Approaches—The Notabilities—The First Set—How the Shah Looked and When he Retired.

(Extracted from the N. Y. Herald.)

LONDON, June 21, 1873.

The Shah was not expected to reach the city till nine—for he had had a long and fatiguing day at Windsor in his reception by the Queen—and it was not only seven; but already, far away from our destination, there was a block in the long line of carriages, and my horse was brought to a stand still. Now was

THE OPPORTUNITY FOR THE CROWD, which, ten deep, lined the sidewalks, to indulge their propensity for chaff balling.

If you give them this license there is no mob in any country which I have visited so easily managed as an English one. They don't like being "diagonned."

They are not, on the whole, favorable to the presence of soldiers save upon rare occasions; but they will submit with alacrity to the directions of the police, and keep their bodies in submission so long as they are allowed free use of their tongues.

Old ladies, doubtless, peeped in their own right, sitting in the middle of their swaying family chairs, guarded by two footmen perched behind, were indecorously addressed by the crowd as "old girls," and to "PUT THEIR WIG STRAIGHT," and in allusion to the blooming freshness of their complexion were compelled to listen to insinuations that they had "put too much on." Gallant officers, blazing with orders and decorations, were humorously asked, "How much for the lot?" while an attaché of some foreign ambassador, who was riding in a carriage with a "Go and get your hair cut," for myself a particular form of address was reserved.

Lord Brougham, when he heard that Lord Campbell was writing the lives of the Chancellors, remarked: "That he had added a new terror to death." The Tielborne trial has added a new terror to those who, no longer possessing sylvan-like proportions, have occasion to run the gauntlet of a London crowd.

My kind friends on the other side of the water will remember that there is about me a certain manly dignity of figure, and will consequently not be surprised that as soon as my cab came to a stand still and I was observed reclining in it placidly smoking my postprandial cigar, I was hailed with shouts of "Hallo!" "wished me luck" and others asked me where I had left the "sealed packet"; that some inquired whether I was on my way to Wapping, and that others wished to know at what price per pound I was now selling mutton; in fact that had to do with a whole running ring of chaff, which I bore with that sweet equanimity which is a part of my nature, occasionally hurling a few Farish shots after my assailants.

THE OUTRAGED has been the scene of events of more or less importance in English history, and nearly two hundred years ago it seems to have acquired that national and political indulgence for which it is principally known in the present day. For in October, 1666, quaint gallant, good-looking old Pepys records in his diary: "To Guildhall, and up and down to see the tables, where under every salt there was a bill of fare, and at the end of the table the person proper for the table, who were ten good dishes to a mess, with plenty of wine of all sorts." The door through which I entered the gallery, was the gallery, on the other side of which were placed the enormous woodcut figures of the giant Gog and Magog, so that I had a splendid view of the hall from end to end, and the night was certainly magnificent. The old hall was blazing with gas, covered with admirably executed decorations, and radiant with every variety of female beauty and gorgeous attire. All those who possessed the right to enter the Merchant Strangers' table, were there to do them. To and fro through the crowd wandered the hosts of an evening, the arrangement of the dances is confined to dancing a part of the evening's programme, and yonder magnificent gilt throne, raised on a high velvet dais, is the spot from which the Shah is to watch the "Tepichschon" evolutions, and an ever increasing, gayly dressed, laughing throng, whisking perfumed crowns goes surging to and fro through the old hall. Looking at the beauty of the men you would scarcely imagine that these are comparatively speaking, the lower orders of the guests, but here, but in the library, where it will await the Shah's arrival.

THE LIBRARY. Yes, this is unquestionably the place for observation within the whole building. Here the prettiest women are gathered together, all seated in an unbroken line. Here, standing about among them, and whispering pleasant nothings, are men whose names and fame are world wide. On another occasion one might like to poke about in the rare books, to look through the rare collection of early printed plays and pageants connected with the city, to examine in its appropriate glass case Shakespeare's own signature attached to a deed of conveyance, bought at a public sale by the Corporation of London; and as present we have enough to do in looking at what Lady Mary Wortley Montagu called "the humans" and watching their movements.

Individuals who stand at the door and roars forth in sonorous tones the name and title of each incoming visitor, is Mr. Hawk.

THE CITY TOASTMASTER, and powerful as are his lungs they will searcely last him through the evening unless he modifies the tone of triumph with which he has just announced "The Right Honorable Mr. Gladstone and Mrs. Gladstone." The Premier looks haggard and worn as usual, his thin, yellow cheeks, and tightly pursed mouth giving him the air of a discontented clown, who is waiting for a chance to get out of the room.

The Premier looks haggard and worn as usual, his thin, yellow cheeks, and tightly pursed mouth giving him the air of a discontented clown, who is waiting for a chance to get out of the room.

What can he have to say to the big, heavy man with whom he is in conversation? The Premier looks haggard and worn as usual, his thin, yellow cheeks, and tightly pursed mouth giving him the air of a discontented clown, who is waiting for a chance to get out of the room.
