CITIZENSHIP

Rev. D. H. Maitland, in a recent sermon at the Sunny Brae Baptist Church, said: "The greatest need of a country is 'not so much statesmanship as good citizenship, Democracy cannot rise higher than its citizenship.'

This is a modern view. The dea that privileged ruling classes brought special wisdom, zeal and unselfish devotion to the business of managing a people's affair received a rude shock from the war it has received another from the disillusion following the war. Able politicians there are in fair abundance; but there is a disposition to grudge according them the title of statesman. And that feeling is perhaps not unconnected with the distrust of unquestioned leadership which was once associated with the idea of a statesman. The world wants comradeship more than leadership.

Statesmen may make a state powerful, and respected, and even establish some degree of prosperity among the masses. Bismarck was no doubt, a statesman in the old sense of the word. So was the first Napoleon. The ex-Kaiser might lay some claims to the title. He certainly did everything in his power to make the German State powerful, though like Louis the x1v he rather acted on the principal, L'etat, cest moi. But neither Napoleon, Bismarck homely virtues of citizenship which are rather vaguely described by the term democracy. the German autocracy rose higher than the German citizenship
