LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XX.

DAVID BRIDGEMORTH TELLS HIS STORY. "Dear father," she murmured, "do not go on with it since it pains you so much."

"The whole must be told my darling," he returned. "I want to show you all the precise circumstances in which I committed that crime."

"Most true, Edwin," said Mrs. Allerton, "and I was always convinced that if the whole particulars had been communicated, your culpability would have been seen to be less than was supposed."

Bridgemorth regarded her with a grateful look, then he heaved a long sigh, and after a few moments' silence continued his tale.

"I desire also to blame no one but myself for what occurred that night. If I was solicited to play, I ought to have refused; if I was tempted, I should have resisted the temptation."

"My one hope was to win money, so that I might repay Philip and supply my own daily needs till relief reached me from the Hall."
