DIANA WENTWORTH,

Or, The Professor's Daughter.

"Keep your threats to yourself," said Rupert sulkily. "I am not going to be dictated to by you. Since you know so much, perhaps you know where my cousin is. I am anxious about her."

"And you deserve to be left in your anxiety. She is quite as safe as she is at my house." "At your house?" repeated Rupert, as if stupefied; and then a light broke in upon him, and he said,

"Then it was for you she refused me? You are at the bottom of it all! Good Lord, what these women are! Diana, who always behaved as if she thought an emperor not fit to hold her foot when she mounted her horse. Who would have thought it! And at your house now! Are you going to serve me as I served you? In this case, I grant you, the play is somewhat better worth the candle."

Another blow sent him reeling back, and there followed a terrible scene of passionate recrimination. Rupert could not but see that if John's defense of Mary Metcalfe had been the accomplishment of a long unfulfilled duty, the result of Diana was prompted by very different feelings. It was not last long. A quarter of an hour after John had gone into the billiard-room, he had left the house and was standing outside in the mist and rain.

CHAPTER XXXIII.
PARTING.

Gertrude and John reached the farmhouse at the same moment. Diana and Susan sitting within heard the sound of wheels, and Diana rose from her chair, with a pale face and eyes which seemed as if they would pierce the darkness, saying, in a low voice,

"They have sent me."

Susan also rose, expectant, and they waited in silence till the door opened to admit Gertrude, followed by John.

Susan stared in amazement as Gertrude came forward. She had never in her life seen anything like this woman with the beautiful, and face, blue eyes and golden hair, in a dress of soft, light, clinging silk, and with jewels on her neck and arms. She had loosened her hold of the heavy wrap she wore, and it was slipping from her shoulders. John picked it up from the floor and put it in the table without having noticed that it was gone. She saw neither John or Susan; she came straight up to Diana with hands outstretched, saying, in a low, thrilling voice,

"Oh! Diana! I have got you at last."

John made a sign to his cousin to come out of the room with him, and as she went the cast a look at the two women standing there. Gertrude had thrown her arms round her cousin, and had hidden her face on her shoulder; her figure shook, with sobs. Diana stood upright, very pale and with dry eyes, looking down on Gertrude, her fingers clutching her cousin's hair with a little, caressing movement, but with a look on her face which, in spite of its tender sadness, told John that Gertrude had come in vain.

They went into the back kitchen and shut the door. Diana's clothes still hung before the fire, which was growing low. Susan began feeling them and moving them about, and there were tears in both eyes and voice as she said,

"Oh, John, but they are fond of each other!"

"Yes," he answered; "Miss Meredith is a very noble woman. Do not see what she can be spared this sorrow, but I wish, with all my heart, I had not helped to bring it to her."

They said no more; John had no wish to talk. He stood with his back to the fire, looking down on the ground, and Susan sat on the fender, her head on her hand, feeling that she was learning many new things which had never hitherto entered her imagination. The could not hear what the two women within were saying; only the lowest murmur of voices reached their ears, sometimes not even that.

It was Diana who spoke first. Had any one but Gertrude come to her she would have left it to them to explain their errand, would probably have scarcely opened her mouth in reply to their questions. But Gertrude was different, and, as soon as her fit of sobbing was over, Diana asked her, very gently,

"Why have you come, Gertrude? to say good by?"

Gertrude drew herself upright and dried her eyes. This was what she had feared, but what she had hoped to avert. She must brace herself for the contest, and she began by taking out her father's letter. She had promised him at the last moment that she would give this letter to Diana and let her read it before trying any persuasion of her own.

This course was against her own inclinations, but it was only on that condition she had been allowed to come. So in reply to Diana's question, she only said,

"I hope not, dear. I hope to take you home with me. This is what I have come for. I have brought a letter from papa which I promised to give to you before I spoke myself."

"She put the letter into Diana's hands, and quite unable to put herself into her cousin's place, feeling only that this John

Garthwaite was a disturber of the peace, an intolerable intruder into the privacy of their family life, she fixed her eyes hungrily on Diana's face as she read, until at last she withdrew them from fear of what she looked upon.

Diana read quickly, her eyes skimmed the paper in a few seconds; but what she read, she read it but that once, was burned into her brain so that she never forgot it. Her face flushed deeply and then grew very, very white, so white that Gertrude feared she was going to faint; but there was no suggestion of the fainting in that upright, defiant figure, those blazing eyes, the hand clenched so tightly, it seemed as though the fingers would never relax, or in the gesture with which the letter once read, it was crumpled up and flung into the glowing coals. Gertrude watched her in terror, too terrified to speak. Diana drew two or three long breaths before she spoke, then she said, in a tone which Gertrude had never heard before:

"They have made it impossible for me to go back. How dared you bring that letter?"

"Diana!" said Gertrude, passionately. "How dared you bring it?" repeated Diana, in the same low, breathless voice. "If you do not know what was in it, it was folly; and if you did, it was an insult, an outrage which I can never forgive."

"Diana!" said Gertrude again. "Do not speak to me as you have lost all right. You have conspired at that, and mamma, too—my own mother to put her name to a thing like that. I knew she did not love me; I had ceased to expect it; but that you are mad, all of you. You are so eaten up with pride and ignorance and prejudice, you are like machines, and you think every one else is the same. You think there is no human nature left in the world. But there is. The whole world is against you in these folies, and I am of the world. You make crime into a virtue, and virtue into a crime. You have no natural feeling left. But I am not of you; I don't belong to you; my name is not the same as yours, and I will go my own way. You throw me off if I do not conform to your rules, which are dead, senseless things, without a shadow of reason or justice in them. I am glad, I am proud to be thrown off. I will not wear your fetters; I will be free, and give my love to the man to whom it naturally belongs!"

FUN, FACTS AND FICTION.

A householder at Binghampton, N. Y., awoke in the night to discover a burglar in his room. He jumped up and fired six shots from one revolver and six shots from another, and the burglar fired at him six times, yet no one was hurt. We respectfully call their attention to a crowbar as a weapon which never goes back on a man.

FACTS AND FIGURES.

Thousands of people have been cured and thousands will be cured by the use of Burdock Blood Bitters, the best remedy for biliousness, dyspepsia, constipation, bad blood, loss of appetite, etc. Millions of bottles have been sold and all have given satisfaction.

JOHNNY AND HIS MA.—Mistress—What is little Johnny crying and yelling for? Give him what he wants. I must write a letter and I want it quick. Nurse—Please, ma'am, he's yelling for his drum an' horn.

"Hair Magic."

Is a good name of Dr. Dorenwald's German preparation for the restoration of the hair. All who have used it pronounce it to be unequalled for restoring the vitality of the hair roots, restoring grey hair, removing dandruff, etc. Just try it. It is first-class. All druggists sell it.

More Bad Luck.—Mr. Winks (looking over the paper)—Cheap Drug & Co. are selling all sorts of patent medicines at half price. Mrs. Winks—Just our luck. There isn't anything the matter with any of us.

A man's wife should always be the same, especially to her husband; but if she is weak and nervous and uses Carter's Iron Pills, she cannot be, for they will make her feel like a different person, at least so they all say, and their husbands say so, too.

Joseph Pulitzer, of the New York World, who has become totally blind, has for a private secretary a young Englishman named Ponsonby, who is a nephew of Lord Ponsonby.

A Severe Attack.

I never felt better in my life than since I used Burdock Blood Bitters. I had a severe bilious attack, I could not eat for days and was unable to work. One bottle cured me. For biliousness use B. B. B.

The Deadliest of Serpents.

The cobra destroys less life than any other snake, but the various forms of cholera, cholera morbus, cholera infantum, diarrhoea, dysentery, cramps, colic, etc. Mortality in Canada from these things is light, owing to the general use of Dr. Fowler's Extract of Wild Strawberry, which is an unfailing specific for all bowel complaints.

VICTORIA TO BENJAMIN.

Births Among Royalty Regularly Announced at Washington.

The funniest thing in connection with this Government's diplomatic relations, says the Washington Star, is the letters sent to the President of the United States by the rulers of other nations announcing births and such events in sovereign families. Such communications are the custom among the powers, and there is a stereotyped form for them. For instance, on the occasion of the last important domestic happening in the household of Queen Victoria a letter came from her to President Harrison, as follows:

Victoria, Queen of Great Britain, Empress of India, Defender of the Faith, etc., to Benjamin Harrison, President of the United States.

Great and Good Friend.—I have the pleasure of announcing to you the birth of a son on the 21st inst. to my granddaughter, the Princess Battenberg, who is doing as well as can be expected. This event will doubtless cement the cordial relations existing between our Governments. Your good friend,

VICTORIA.

This letter is written on ruled blue paper, and to it President Harrison replies on white vellum paper in a big sheet as follows:

Great and Good Friend.—I have received the pleasant news conveyed to me by your communication of the 21st inst. and am glad that the happy event went off safely. It is my earnest prayer and expectation that the child will be strong and healthy, and that the friendship which so happily subsists between our two Governments.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

It is worth noting that the President never sees these letters from Queen Victoria and other sovereigns at all, and the replies which are written and signed in elegant Spencerian hand by a $1,200 clerk in the Department of State, are merely taken to him for his signature. Such is the nonsense of diplomacy.

Masculine Philosophy.

Mrs. Snapp—Oh, dear! I don't see why these reformers insist upon women wearing such ridiculous things as divided skirts.

Old Snapp—Well, I do. It's so they can have a better chance to kick.

A Good Appetite

Is essential to good health; but at this season it is often lost owing to the poverty or impurity of the blood, derangement of the digestive organs, and weakness of the system of the changing season. Hood's Sarsaparilla is a powerful medicine for creating an appetite, toning the digestion and giving strength to the whole system. Now is the time to take it. Be sure to get Hood's Sarsaparilla.

MONTRÉAL, Sept. 9, 1887.

To the Canada Sugar Refining Co., Montreal.

GENTLEMEN,—I have personally taken samples from a large stock of your Granulated Sugar, "REDPATH" brand, and carefully tested them by the Polariscopes, and I find these samples to be as near to absolute purity as can be obtained by any process of Sugar Refining.

The test by the Polariscopes showed in yesterday's yield 99.99 per cent. of Pure Cane Sugar, which may be considered commercially as ABSOLUTELY PURE SUGAR.
