London, Thursday, July 22, 1897. National Rivalries and the Progress of the World.

Cablegrams are constantly being sent abroad pointing out that there is preparation in various parts of the world that clearly points to war be tween two or more of the great powers. The competition and friction between becoming increasingly keen. We are given information about Germany's ardent desire for colonial expansion, and for expensive additions to her fleet. In the French Chamber of Deputies the members almost tumbled over one another in their anxiety to vote a large credit for constructing new warships, and for establishing a new naval basis at Biazerta, a fortified seaport in the French colony of Tunis, in Northbeen striving hard and with considerable success to at least acquire the control of territory, though she has no have also been recently entertained by the publication of a wordy dispatch from Secretary Sherman, of the United States, with regard to the Bering Sea drawn some highly hysterical remarks from the jingo section of the British press, which has striven hard to conup the British Empire holus bolus. subject of these international political pyrotechnics, the Canadian people will not likely stay awake at nights in momentary expectation of hostilities to

We sometimes wonder at the surprise these evidences of international rivalries, and the fears they entertain lest perchance the sequels may be some dreadful period of killing and destroying. These rivalries after all are really but an extension of the competitive programme that is in the course of execution in every walk of life. There is a great deal of selfishness in the world which no altruistic argument has as yet been able to combat, and optimistic though we are, it does not appear to us that a remedy is near at

> A Peeping Tom Ducked in the Sea by the Indignant Crowd.

New York, July 21 .- Garland's bathing pavilion, near the iron pier, was alive with business at 5 p.m., when one of the patrons, a New York woman, essing after a bath, noticed a curi ous noise underfoot, and suspected the presence of "Jack the Peeper." She alled Charles Daly, the attendant, and informed him.

Daly took a running leap down into the sand and darted under the pavilion. There, sure enough, was Jack the Peeper, minus coat and vest, for the rate of company racining at ease the sake of comfort, reclining at ease the broad of his back. Discovery came upon him like a lap of thunder. Like a frightened abbit he scrambled out of his hiding place, but Daly was upon him. He tought feebly and howled dismally, out the indignant surf man, seconded other attendants, dragged him down the crowded beach. Hundreds of men and women gathered. At first they yelled. "Fair play! Give him a chance!" But as Daly roared out the facts, and shook his howlprisoner as a cat would a rat the went up, "Duck the loafer!" In less time than it takes to tell in the terrified peeper had been forced into the surf by a volley of lusty kicks. On they drove him until the water reached his chin, and his yells for mercy could be heard for half a mile. To add to the culprit's misery, a big nan in a little rowboat used an oar with effect on the peeper's head and Finally the well nigh exhausted culpit was allowed to wade ashore. By that time fully a thousand excursionists were massed upon the beach. Through this crowd the dripping man fled with the energy of terror. They opened a way for him, and as ne ran the gauntlet, yelping at every orelias and men with shoe leather. They found his coat and vest under Garland's pavilion. It contained $3 in cash and a silver watch. The peepe was a tall, sallow-faced man about years old, and well groomed. His coat is a garment such as would be worn by a man of good income.
