London, Tuesday, September 6. Labor Day.

Labor Day was observed in the centers of industry in the usual fashion The organized demonstrations were confined to the trades unionists, though all classes in a country like Canada could enter into the spirit of the day, since there is, strictly speaking, no distinctively labor class. The stalwart manhood that marched in the procession yesterday was in no way differentiated from the mass of the people.

Thank Providence, there are no "lower orders" in this new country. We have some self-styled upper circles, but one generation back disposes of their claims. Only in the old civilizations can we see and realize what the term "working class" really means. In a European country the artisan uncomplainingly wears the badge of his condition. His ancestors were factory operatives, his children will be the same, and he aspires to be nothing else. He is content to dress in a peculiar way, any time as a member of a class. His identity is stamped in his garb, his speech and his bearing. In Canada or the United States, however, the keenest

The another good year for the Dominion, collection embraces about 50 poems, the majority of which appear in print for the first time. It is prefaced by tributes in verse and prose from Mr. Dearness, Mr. Warman, Mr. Lawson and other local admirers. Mr. W. E. Saunders describes Robert Elliott as "the one man in the London district who seemed to take such an intelligent and inquiring interest in each branch of natural history that every specialist took profit as well as pleasure out of intercourse with him." From Mr. Dearness we learn something of his uneventful but beautiful and serviceable life. The youngest of four brothers, and of delicate constitution, he was not tied by the regular routine of farm duties. He studied for the teaching profession and entered the Normal Training School at Toronto, but illness compelled him to relinquish his ambition. He fought against his invalidism with infinite cheerfulness, and found his chief delight in the companionship of books and nature, to which his poetical temperament inclined him. "Not even Gilbert White knew his parish of Selborne better than Robert Elliott knew the beautiful and winding Thames in the neighborhood of the valley that he named Plover Mills." He wished to be useful to his fellow-citizens, and served at one time or another in every local organization-of school, church, or municipality. His verse gives the impression that he wrote poetry because he lived and felt it. The habits of birds, of plants, of flowers, and all the sights and sounds of the country appealed to the poet in him, as well as the trained stuure. This example of his verse will suffice to show the true poetic feeling which idealizes common ob

The editors and pubishers have done a service to Canadian poetry by preserving these offerings of a gentle soul, attuned to the beauties of the field, the woods, the river and the quiet scenes, amid which he loved to roam.
