

her daughter, a girl of thirteen or fourteen years of age, who happened to wait on them, paid great attention to their conversation, and, from certain expressions dropped by them, she discovered their designs. As soon as this generous girl was certain as to their intentions, she immediately left the house, escaped from the town, notwithstanding the vigilance of the centinels, and immediately took the road to Moy, running as fast as she was able, without shoes or stockings, which, to accelerate her progress, she had taken off, in order to inform the Prince of the danger that menaced him. She reached Moy, quite out of breath, before Lord Loudon; and the Prince, with difficulty, escaped in his robe de chambre, night-cap, and slippers, to the neighbouring mountains, where he passed the night in concealment. The dear girl, to whom the Prince owed his life, was in great danger of losing her own, from her excessive fatigue on this occasion, but the care and attentions she experienced restored her to life, and her health was at length re-established. The Prince, having no suspicion of such a daring attempt, had very few people with him in the castle of Moy. "As soon as the girl had spread the alarm, the blacksmith of the village of Moy presented himself to the Prince, and assured his Royal Highness that he had no occasion to leave the castle; as he would answer for it, with his head, that Lord Loudon and his troops would be obliged to return faster than they came. The Prince had not sufficient confidence in his assurances to neglect seeking his safety, by flight to the neighbouring mountains. However, the blacksmith, for his own satisfaction, put his project in execution. He instantly assembled a dozen of his companions, and advanced with them about a quarter of a league from the castle, on the road to Inverness. There he laid an ambuscade, placing six of his companions, on each side of the highway, to wait the arrival of the detachment of Lord Loudon, enjoining them not to fire till he should tell them, and then not to fire together, but one after another. When the head of the detachment of Lord Loudon, was opposite the twelve men, about eleven o'clock in the evening, the blacksmith called out, with a loud voice, 'Here come the villains, who intend carrying off our Prince; fire, my lads, do not spare them; give, no quarter!' In an instant muskets were discharged from each side of the road, and the detachment, seeing their project had taken wind, began to fly, in the greatest disorder, imagining that our whole army was lying in wait for them. Such was their terror and consternation, that they did not stop till they reached Inverness. In this manner did a common blacksmith, with twelve of his companions, put Lord Loudon and fifteen hundred regular troops to flight. The first of his Lordship, who happened to be at the head of the detachment, was killed by the first discharge; and the detachment did not wait for a second." pp. 110—112.

The battle of Culloden was fought on the 16th of April, when the Highland army, exhausted by the fatigues of a night march, and the want of provisions, sustained a signal defeat. The Prince is blamed for his eagerness for an engagement, for listening exclusively to his Irish advisers, and for the pusillanimity and dejection which he exhibited after the disastrous turn his affairs had taken.

The meeting and parting of the vanquished chiefs at Ruthven, is an interesting part of the narrative, and the account is more detailed than any which we had previously seen; and though it will lay us under the necessity of giving rather a long extract, we regard it as too valuable to suppress.

"I arrived, on the 18th, at Ruthven, which happened, by chance, to become the rallying point of our army; without having been previously fixed on. There I found the Duke of Athol, Lord George Murray, the Duke of Perth, Lord John Drummond, Lord Ogilvie, and many other chiefs of clans, with about four or five thousand Highlanders, all in the best possible dispositions for renewing hostilities and taking their revenge. The little town of Ruthven