MISS ILLINGTON PROUD POSSESSOR OF MODJESKA'S SHAKSPEREAN COSTUMES

What greater compliment could a great tragedienne, upon retiring from the stage, offer a young sister actress, than to bestow upon her the mantles and robes which she had used in presentation of a repertoire of Shakespeare's immortal plays? This high honor was conferred upon Margaret Illington by the famous Polish actress, Madame Modjeska, who, after seeing that gifted young woman in the celebrated "sleep walking scene" from "Macbeth," declared Miss Illington worthy to make use of these costumes.

These gifts from the great Modjeska were reverently laid away in lavender at the time Miss Illington received them. She gazed upon them with longing eyes, but ardently awaiting the day when she might justifiably feel called upon to don them in the full capacity of their intended use.

Madame Modjeska will the several costumes to Miss Illington after the latter's appearance in the "Macbeth" scene at the Modjeska theatre, given in New York a few years ago, among them being the Viola's habit, Rosalind's attire and various little accessories such as the parchment letter which the Polish tragedienne had used for so many years in the room at the Hotel de Ville, which Madame Modjeska conferred upon Miss Illington in a recent interview, Miss Illington said:

"It isn't egotism, it is to feel that I shall some day become, as competent to play Lady Macbeth as Modjeska was? There is a well founded prediction that I shall—for has not the wonderful Modjeska herself declared it? I consider this the very highest compliment to my future that I could possibly receive. The mantles and robes are still laid away, of course, but just before I began to study the role of Maggie Schults in my new play, I went to my home, where they are carefully stored, and, for the first time, arrayed myself in them. I cannot describe my feelings as I saw myself in the mirror wearing the mantle of Modjeska which has always seemed such a sacred possession to me."

That Miss Illington is well qualified for the future greatness which Madame Modjeska prophesied for her is evidenced by her success in many important roles, as well as for the work in "Macbeth."

Following the Japanese play she appeared at the head of the cast of "Mrs. Wollstonecraft's Boots," "Yvette," a strong play by the author of "Zaza," Elmer's "His House in Order," in which she ran the entire gamut from lightest comedy to the depths of tragedy.

Madame Modjeska, who is now appearing in "The Thief," as co-star with the late Kyrie Bellus, Miss Illington was also prominent figure in the A. M. Palmer all-star cast of "The Two Orphans." She is now appearing in the greatest success of her career as Maggie Schults, in Charles Kenyon's play, which comes to the Royal Alexandra next week.

There are mothers who bring up their children in an atmosphere of bygone days. They are continually talking about the olden times, and frequently talking about the olden times, and frequently talking about the olden times.

It is that mothers watch their children's state of health, in fact, that we are trying to help them to do so. But we do not advocate "symptoms." There is such a thing, you know, as developing symptoms by suggestion.

Abjure all talk about disease and encourage exercise in the open air. That is a preventive and cure combined, and is therefore useful in nearly all cases. Children who spend their time playing in the fresh air, have little time for appendicitis.

Playing outdoors is nature's way of keeping children strong. Little ones do not need any urging to keep them exercising in the open; but older children would often rather read or stay in the house than play vigorously, so it is necessary not only to give big boys and girls a chance to play, but to direct the play, and induce them to make the most of the chance.

First has nothing to stimulate him to action, but imitation; but by competition, in order to have play vigorously and profitably, it is "up to" the parents to find companions—a little company that can be trusted to play together.
