Albert O'Dell, public school inspector, found the books too expensive and too many of them required. He produced geographies, readers, grammars and arithmetics in a dilapidated condition, which he said had been in use from six months to four years. The binding of the geographies and spellers was particularly bad. He said that 50 per cent. of the text-books in the home remained unused and gave reasons why text-books should be free. The rich and books should be free. The rich and poor would be on equal terms and a respect for public property would be taught. There would be fewer changes callen.
