"We all know that in an ideal which calls for action, people can lose themselves, or rather, perhaps I should say, find themselves. No country has ever given a greater example of what can be done in war than the United States in the last year. It was a wonderful thing to send 2,000,000 men in so short a time for an ideal. But there are ideals other than those which call for great action.

"We can find in art, in music, in architecture, joys, not duties, which make us great. We can find them in the beauty of the world. During the war, those anxious days in England, the greatest comfort I had was the unfailing return of spring every year—the leaves budding out, the birds singing—all giving a feeling of sanctuary in which one might retire from even the greatest troubles of the world. The processes of nature go on in spite of all man can do; there must be behind it peace and security."

Lord Grey told of meeting, in the woodland of Hampshire, a young American soldier who took great pleasure in the view of a little stretch of river. He told Lord Grey, whom he did not know,
