BOOSE AND THE DRUG HABIT

(The following article by Dr. W. A. Evans in the Chicago Tribune answers the claim that prohibition increases the use of drugs.)

When the wave of ratification of the prohibition amendment was sweeping over the country the statement was made that prohibition would increase the use of opium and cocaine. This statement is incorrect. The effect will be just the contrary. The succession of drug habits is as follows—tobacco, alcohol, opium, cocaine.

A man generally starts the use of drugs by smoking cigarettes. Presently that drug loses the kick and he goes to a larger, stronger dose of tobacco. This leads to alcohol. After a while he wants a stronger kick than he can get from alcohol and he takes on opium or some of its derivatives. When opium no longer gives the sensation that is satisfactory he goes to cocaine.

Prohibition of the use of cocaine practically has been operative for several years. For a number of years there has been practical prohibition of the use of opium. The opium user now depends on the bootlegger.

Now we are to have prohibition of the use of alcohol. The opponents of the prohibition amendment would have us think that making whiskey difficult to get will cause men to take up a new habit calling for a drug that is more difficult to get. The answer is first that it is not good physiology. The science of the thing teaches us that when we break the alcohol link we throw the links beyond that out of operation. When we short-cut one step in a progression the tendency is for the progression to stop. Some of the people who, having become hardened to whiskey, take up morphine under the old order, under the new will not become addicted to anything.

The second part of the answer is that it has not worked out that way. The prohibition of cocaine and opium has not increased the amount of alcohol addiction. Nor has it increased the number of opium and cocaine addicts. The states and cities where there has been prohibition of alcohol for a number of years have had no increase in the use of opium and its derivatives and cocaine. That there will be an increase in the use of these drugs, if prohibition is not enacted, is of course, true. When the legitimate sale is stopped the illegitimate sale increases and continues to increase. No nation ever quit any habit instantly. It will take a generation wholly to stop the use of the drug. But each five-year period will witness an improvement over the one which went before.

Now we are to have prohibition of the use of alcohol. The opponents of the prohibition amendment would have us think that making whiskey difficult to get will cause men to take up a new habit calling for a drug that is more difficult to get. The answer is first that it is not good physiology. The science of the thing teaches us that when we break the alcohol link we throw the links beyond that out of operation. When we short-cut one step in a progression the tendency is for the progression to stop.
