CHAPTER XVII. COUPLED WITH CRUELTY.

Philip Bourchier had never for an instant doubted the truth of Digby's assertion that Frances was John Bourchier's daughter.

He saw how, in every way, events had turned against him since that fatal night--how, everything had seemed unhinged up and at an end, this witness, or second-hand witness, to every act of his on that occasion had appeared and spoiled everything--how he had been punished through the only medium that could really wound him--his love for his children. Seeing and thinking of all this, he began to believe in destiny; and it appeared the most natural thing that Allan should have chosen for his wife

Frances. He had felt less than a fatalist; there was plenty to confirm Digby's words. When Allan married Frances, it is doubtful whether he knew anything about her. She, however, certainly troubled little about it. She told him her ancestors were respectable tradesmen, but that she was absolutely alone in the world. After their marriage she had related all she knew respecting the mysterious disappearance of her father; and even made Allan promise to assist her in her search for Mander. Allan had seen Mr. Trenfield on the matter, and found that gentleman so sure that John Bourchier had been murdered for plunder, that he looked upon any researches as hopeless. Mr. Trenfield told him that the man had left his bankers with some valuable property in his possession; no one knew of what it consisted, but it must have been valuable. Since then he had not been heard of. It may be that Mr. Trenfield spoke of James Bourchier, of Newham, but the name was absolutely alone in Allan's mind. He was out a child when the last lawsuit took place, and the matter was taboos in the family. The less such things are talked about the better.

On her side Frances said little about her forefathers. She was too sensible not to know that, as simply the daughter of a tradesman, she was not a proper match for Allan Bourchier. As Miss Francesca, who would, she believed, in time be known as one of the greatest singers of the day, she felt she was any man's equal. Leaving her beauty and great gifts out of the question, and looking only from a pecuniary point of view, she would in a few years be earning a princely income. She was not ashamed of her father, but there is often as much vulgarity in flaunting one's humble origin in people's faces as in resorting to pitiful but transparent expedients to conceal it. Had she been asked, the information would have been at once given; not being asked, she did not volunteer it. To Allan she often spoke of her father, and always expressed the gratitude she felt to him for having given her an education so much above the station in life he occupied.

At Redhill, by common consent, no one ever spoke of Mr. Bourchier's connection with the midnight assassin. Soon after it occurred, it became a matter to his family that any allusion to the affair were vain, so it was rapidly becoming a tradition. Frances was always to have the favor she desired, and she was to have the favor she desired, and she was to have the favor she desired.

Frances on her side tried her best to win the poor little woman's confidence and affection. She was not accustomed to find such a task difficult. To call anyone her friend was always to have the favor she desired, and she was to have the favor she desired, and she was to have the favor she desired.
