As to the derivation of the word bulldog, it is only necessary to state that at one time this species was exclusively used in bull baiting, the name by which it is universally known. A cross between this and the terrier is appropriately termed the bull terrier.

A Scientific Voice Improver

Because of its strengthening influence upon the vocal chords, Catarrh disease cannot be too highly recommended as a wonderful voice improver. It almost instantly removes huskiness or hoarseness, thus insuring clearness and brilliancy of tone. Catarrh disease keeps the mucous surfaces in perfect condition, and its regular use absolutely prevents colds and throat irritation, thereby removing the singer's greatest source of anxiety, untidiness of voice. The most eminent speakers and Prima Donas would not be without small degrees their uniform strength and brilliancy of tone to its influence. The hard rubber inhaler fits quite conveniently into a purse or vest pocket, and may be used in the church, theatre, any place or time. Complete outfit $1. Small size 25c. Few temptations beset the industrious, but all temptations assail the idle.

What does it profit a woman if she gain the whole world of knowledge and lose her own health? Young women students, and school teachers, eager, ambitious, and full of energy, very often neglect their health in the struggle to gain education. They eat insufficient food, and at irregular hours, they allow irregularity of the womanly functions to be established, and the result is that they become chronic invalids with all their education practically worthless. There is a plain road back to health for such as these, marked by the feet of thousands. It is the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery for diseases of the stomach and digestive and nutritive organs, and Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription for diseases of the delicate organs of womanhood. A cure so certainly follows the use of these remedies that the number of thousands of women who have tried the treatment, ninety-eight in every hundred have been perfectly and permanently cured. Constipation, with its calamitous ramifications, is a common ailment of students, can be entirely cured by the use of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets.

A SINCERE TRIBUTE

AN IRISHMAN TELLS OF THE GOOD NATURE OF BRITAIN'S KING.

A Man Who Never Did an Inconsiderate Thing, Who Never Said a Tactless Thing, But Whose Life Has Been of Necessity Devoted to the Non-Essentials of Being—Fond of Popular Liberties.

James O'Donnell Bennett writes thus of King Edward VII.:

His gift for making everybody feel good was positive genius and no figment of a truckling imagination. When the royal car took him through the streets of London this one and that one was greeted with various degrees of respect and affection—the old Queen with reverence, Alexandra with chivalry, as if she were the sweetheart of the Empire, the Empress Frederick with tender sympathy.

But Edward with cheer, in which there were good humor and good fellowship. It was amazing to see how instantly his appearance in a royal pageant relieved the tension, and set people up comfortably on their weary legs. His mother received the tribute of awe, his sisters the tribute of respect, but for him was reserved the pleasantest sound that can greet the ears of a prince—cheers with the welcome of laughter in them.

The people would begin to grin amiably as soon as the word ran down the line "The Prince is coming." When he hove in sight there was nothing perfunctory about the greetings. They vibrated with the spirit of fun, deep-chested, jovial cheers, such as greet a winning sportsman or a popular idol, whom we are glad to see in continued luck.

It was so on Jubilee day of '97, when he rode on horseback directly behind his mother's carriage. The eyes of thousands filled with tears as they saw her—that sad, serene little figure, above whom hovered the brightness of so many glories, the shadow of so many sorrows. Then they saw the merry prince whom they had loved and berated and forgiven for nearly half a century, and they hastily brushed away the tears and gave him once again the deep-voiced welcome which he had earned by his comradeship behind it.

Again, I saw him late one night, when with much rumbling of wheels and clattering of hoofs and jingling of accoutrements, he and his retinue swept out of the narrow Strand and into the broad expanse of Trafalgar-square. He was on his way from a command performance of opera at Covent Garden to Marlborough House. The streets were flooded with light and you could see him plainly through the glass doors and sides of his carriage. He was pale, and I swear his face would have seemed merely stupid had it not been so serene. The thrusters followed his carriage, instead of riding around it. I have never seen a man in a position that was in itself so abjectly helpless. Only the will to harm him was required to put him in a position perilous in the last degree. Yet there was in his eye a placid look of trustfulness and affection that stirred a kindly feeling in more than one republican heart. The wheels of his carriage all but brushed our coats as we gaped at him. He was dressed in a scarlet uniform, and blazing with decorations. He looked just what he was—a splendid, pleasing figure-head, serving an entirely and harmless purpose, in some respects, a very useful purpose.

The tired, close-packed multitudes cheered him way inside the palace gates as the glimpse of him had so restored the gala spirit of the long-drawn-out, tiring day that everybody scurried for the neighboring cafes to drink his health.

The man, without whom the world could have got on just as well as has with him, has been the object of intense loyalty and affection for a generation and a half, because he has an intensely loyal and affectionate nature.

He has loved to be loved, and he has worked on the principle that the surest way to receive affection is to inspire it.

More than any other public figure of our time, he has been all things to all men, more than once so complacently so as to bring reproach upon himself.

He has made it the business of his life to cultivate the amenities, the genial superfluities, that help to make existence pleasanter, if not more purposeful.

He possesses social sagacity in its perfection and unimpaired adaptability. He can contribute a sane hint or a feasible plan to a family conference in which sit the throned heads of Russia, England, Denmark and Greece, and he can say the pleasant, cheering word at a dinner of London cab drivers.

Consider, in making your estimate of him, the interesting fact every one of his multitudinous occupations has had to do with the non-essentials of life.

For a man who has been dilettante-student, traveler, horseman, administrator of social functions, amateur farmer, hunter, yachtsman and connoisseur of pictures, for such a man to have at all impressed his personality on his time is marvelous. This the Prince and King certainly has done to some extent.

Just now it might perhaps be hard to say, and the value, such as it is, of his work can perhaps not be more exactly sum up now than by saying that he made society more genial and less snobbish.

This was the task of only an ardent humanitarian, to be sure, and so makes no very great entry in the sum total of the world's progress. But it was a task worth doing, nevertheless, and when he ceased to fulfil it Europe will look in vain among her lofty placed ones for a man to carry on the fosterings of society's elegance as tactfully and sanely as he did.

It may not be much to go down in history as the pleasant, agreeable, Presents, I often say, endear absents.

Prince, who never did an inconsiderate thing and never said a tactless thing, but it is something.

"Molto amabile," the nuns of the Sepolite Vive call him to this day, and cherish the memory of this visit, for he talked with them sympathetically, and was interested in their handiwork. "Molto amabile" he has been to all the world, patiently and consistently. "Pleasant a tout le monde," Prince Metetrich, who had a shrewd eye for character, called him when he was a boy. That sturdy, uncompromising republican, Gambetta, shook his head in bewilderment after he had chatted with him and said: "Oh, those lucky Englishmen! Their very princes are fonder of popular liberties than are our very liberals."

All because the prince had uttered the neither original nor startling, but very tactful remark that every nation had a right to choose its own form of government.

Fond of liberty, and particularly of his own liberty to come and go as he liked, and to amuse himself as he pleased, Edward VII. has been all his life. He has respected the rights of other people and he has debonairly taken for granted that other people would respect his. It required some courage to do this, for had he invariably truckled to the rigorous exactions of the nonconformist conscience he would have had a poor time of it. Despite the fact that he has a will of his own, he steered safely clear of scandalizing the possessors of the nonconformist conscience on the one hand and being a prig, and a hypocrite on the other.

The English are an intensely materialistic and practical people, in their pleasures, as well as their business and their politics. Edward has been liked and loved by them because he is, in a superlative degree, what they are. They set a great store by material good things, and he has been a frank, breezy, unaffected exposure of their tastes, liking good horses, good wine, good fellows—masculine or feminine—good hunting, good clothes, good manners—liking, in a word, the things a prosperous Englishman likes, and gets, if he can.

As Gambetta said, he is a better democrat than many who profess the faith. He forbade the members of his household and his servants to address his children as their Royal Highnesses. He snubbed the Norfolk gentry unmercifully because they took umbrage at his inviting the sturdy farmers on his Sandringham estates to the same festivities to which he had bidden them. He had his boys trained by old sailors on the B. D. Bannan and the Bacchante, to the end that they might know how to do a man's work dexteriously and feel an honest artisan's pride in it.

He has found his keenest enjoyment when he could knock about remote corners of the world with his wife under the alias of "Mr. and Mrs. Williams."

He has made the purple, red and black respected on the great race course of England, as a token of honest, gentlemanly sport.

He has relieved social life of some of its foolish complexities, by inventing the semi-dress coat and the short tunic, and the short tunic.

All his life long he has been gentle, frank, engaging, fun-loving, discreet-speaking—and he has never hurt anybody's feelings—which is a kindly thing in itself.

AFRICA'S SLEEPING SICKNESS.
British Scientists to Study Strange and Usually Fatal Disease.

An expedition organized by the British Foreign Office and the Royal Society recently left England for East Africa to investigate the whole subject of the "sleeping sickness" in Uganda. The expedition consists of Dr. Low, who lately returned from investigating yellow fever in St. Lucia, and who recently carried out some highly interesting experiments in regard to malaria in the Roman Campagna; Dr. Christy, who has done valuable medical work on the Niger and in connection with the plague in India, and Dr. Castellani, of the Jenner Institute.

These gentlemen will go direct from Marseilles to Entebbe, the headquarters in Uganda, via Mombasa. It is hoped to conclude the preliminary investigation into the subject in about eight months. The observers will not only study in the various provinces of the Uganda Protectorate the history and causes of the disease, with a view to remedial measures, but also the area within which the malarial fever has been declared itself.

"Sleeping sickness," or negro lethargy, is a very fatal disease, which has been long known in West Africa, but has recently traveled along the Congo into Uganda. The fear is that it will spread to this region. It has many features in common with the general paralysis of the insane. Hitherto it has only attacked natives, and three cases were recently under treatment in London hospitals. Latest reports from Uganda indicate that in Bugosa alone 20,000 persons have succumbed, and it is said to be still on the increase.

King William's Determination.
There are some interesting glimpses of William IV and Queen Adelaide in a volume which Mr. Brintley Johnson has ready for Publication. It consists of the letters and personal reminiscences of the late Miss Clithrow of London House. We learn, for one thing, that King William made a "determination never to lay his head on his pillow till he had signed everything he ought to on the day."

This caused him "cruel suffering" from cramp, and he had often to stop in the middle of work and "put his hand in hot water." The documents which have to be signed by the King in these days must be many more—London Chronicle.

MISS LAURA HOWARD,

President South End Ladies' Golf Club, Chicago, Cured by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound After the Best Doctors Had Failed To Help Her.

"DEAR MRS. PINKHAM:—I can thank you for perfect health to-day. Life looked so dark to me a year or two ago. I had constant pains, my limbs swelled, I had dizzy spells, and never knew one day how I would feel the next. I was nervous and had no appetite, neither could I sleep soundly nights. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, used in conjunction with your Sanative Wash, did more for me than all the medicines and the skill of the doctors. You might months I have enjoyed perfect health. I verily believe that most of the doctors are guessing and experimenting when they try to cure a woman with an assortment of complications, such as mine; but you do not guess. How I wish all suffering women could only know of your remedy; there would be less suffering I know."—LAURA HOWARD, 115 Newberry Ave., Chicago, Ill. —$5000 Refert if above testimonial is not genuine.

Advice to Mothers
If your little boy or girl comes home with a sore throat, the first thing to do is to rub the throat and chest with Polson's Nerve-line. Don't be afraid to use Nerve-line freely—a whole bottle full wouldn't burn or blister the tenderest skin. Rub in until all taken up by the pores, and just before the child goes to sleep give him a glass of hot water into which 30 drops of Nerve-line has previously been stirred. This is a sure, pleasant and speedy cure. Large bottles 25 cents.
