INDIA.

About 270 miles from the Bay of Bengal, the river Ganges divides into two separate streams, the one leading eastward, the other westward, as both flow south towards the sea. The branch on the east retains the name, and the greatest portion of the water of the parent stream, and flows in a somewhat devious course for 300 miles to the swampy Sunderbund through which, in a great many separate channels, it enters the ocean. The western branch, flowing onward about 40 miles divides, and after a considerable distance again unites and becomes the Hooghly, which forms the port of Calcutta and is the only part of this vast Indian river system navigable by the ships of the great maritime nations who now trade with British India. The city of Calcutta itself, stands about 100 miles from the sea, on the western bank of this noble stream. From this point inland, to near the town of Rajmabul, which stands on the Ganges somewhat above the first dividing of that river, the navigation, even for the small native craft that use it, is dangerous and uncertain, and the growing commerce of the country has led to the projection of a railway connecting the grand stream with the Hooghly. This undertaking has been pushed successfully onward, until it begins to penetrate the last portion of the region to be passed over. Here it approaches the borders of the hilly country of the Santals. These are a race of mountaineers very different in many respects from the Hindoos and also from the Mahomedan population of India. Their idollatry is of a more simple and colder nature, and they have nothing of the caste of the Hindoo, nor does it seem, as if they had the deep bigotry of the Mahomedan. With many of the vices of the savage, this people are said to evince an honesty and love of truth unusual among the natives of India. One of the most fierce and fatal of insurrections has burst out among the Santals, and descending from their hills, they have destroyed villages of the more peaceful inhabitants of the lower country in indiscriminate fury. It was at first said, that unjust and licentious conduct on the part of those employed on the railway had provoked the rising. It was also reported, that the approach of the railway had led them to dread the idea of their country being seized, and their liberties destroyed. These reports, however, are completely set aside by the discovery of a proclamation on the person of one of their leaders. It states that the Santals have been oppressed by the Bengalee money lenders who had settled in their hills, that they were also oppressed by the Amahs, or native officers of our Government, from whom they could obtain no redress, and that those oppressions were "the sin of the Sahibs."—that is, that the Government was responsible for them; that the Santals were, therefore to take up arms to redress their own wrongs; that their Thakoor, or god, had become incarnate at the house of Sindoo Mungoo, through whom all communications to him would be made. The proclamation directs the Santals to assemble at the appointed rendezvous, and promise them the sovereignty of the whole country on the right bank of the Ganges and Bhagirutee. This indicates that the evil is one of gradual and considerable growth.

The railway is proving of the greatest service in forwarding troops to the scene of conflict, and there is little doubt that the rising may soon be quelled, still it is one of the most serious kind, and from the nature of the country, full as it is of all but impenetrable jungle, it may turn out to have far too much of the characteristics of a Caffre war. It is one of those instructive calamities that teach us, with no gentle voice, the necessity of seeking the enlightenment of the heathen, and also their defence from the grasping and wicked hands of those who seem ever to walk in the van of civilization, to give the savage the worst possible view of civilized man, by robbing and plundering as they go along. Were it possible (and we doubt not it is) to protect these native tribes from the wrongs to which they are subjected, millions less would be required to keep them in order. We earnestly hope that prevention will yet be found out by Governments to be infinitely better and vastly cheaper in all such concerns.
