The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

"It is at least a thought for treasure that the Queen and his Majesty have not been my aggressors," said Gilbert, with a vain effort to conjure up a smile.

"My hand upon it, Elliot," returned the Captain brusquely, "did I suspect that her Majesty had knowledge of the truth, and yet permitted thus to be done, my commission should be at her, feet ere sunset; and by the smass, I am disposed to do whether or no, for there will be little pleasure in her service whilst Doughas is her master."

"And there is some pleasure too,' proceeded Gilbert, not heeding the latter words of his friend, 'that sweet distress Mary knows me innocent, and holds me in some little esteem."

me innocent, and house me in some new teem.

'Too much esteem, it would appear,' was the gruff rejoinder; 'rouse yourself, man, from dreams that I have warned you are perious to yourself and their fair conqueror. Away with you to a land where your sword will be useful and forget her.'
'Forget her!'
He eshoed the words dreamily, yet the tone was that of one who doubted the possibility of finding oblivion to so precious a memory.

He eahoed the words dreamily, yet the tone was that of one who doubted the possibility of finding oblivion to so precious a memory.

The Captain regarded him with a look that was almost grotesque, it was so grim and yet so full of commiseration. It was as if he looked at a wounded child, angry with it for some silly desire, yet without having the heart to chide.

The brief time allowed to Gilbert for making his preparations to quit the precincts of the castle had already nearly elapsed; and of this disagreeable fact Lindsay was made aware by the bronze face of a Geneva clock which hung above the chimney board. But the person most concerned was so lost in sad and unpleasant reverie that he took no note of the time.

Only ten minutes remained, and still Gilbert showed no symptoms of stirring to action. The Captain in silence rose and went over to an oaken cabinet at the farther end of the room. From a secret drawer he produced a purse indifferently well packed with golden angels. From the lower part of the cabinet he took, with an air of respect which was wholly absent in his manner of handling the purse, a silver-mounted Toledo. He unsheathed the sword, admired the finely tempered blade, and as he resheathed, looked as fife had some compunction of heart for what he was about to do.

He shook Gilbert roughly by the shoulder. Wake, man, wake, he said warmly, Dame Fortune is wooed in action and won by brave deeds, not idle dreams.'

The dreamer started to his feet and glanced at the clock.

'Forgive me, Captain. In truth I have been somewhat absent, and I thank the hand that rouses me from the unhappy land of visions to this world with all its bright and cark realities. With Our Lady's help you shall find that I can act as well as dream.'

'Then here is that to act with, and never man had better tool to cut his way in the world. 'Tis a rare blade, Gilbert, and none but one who is dear to me as a son could I have parted with it. By the masy you shall bless the day Angus bade you render up your sword.'

'I cannot tha

bless the day Angus bade you render up your sword."

'I cannot thank you now, good friend,' was the busky response, 'but may we both live till I have in some little requited you.'

'Tut, Tut, man, 'tis an empty flagon that clinks. You shall thank me best by using this well.'

'I will try.'

'Meanwhile, here are twenty angels to keep the stomach in countenance till the hand find work to do.'

This generosity from a man who prided himself upon his grim visage and stern adherence to the strict line of duty although it did not surprise Gilbert, affected him deeply, and he turned away his head as he answered—

'That I cannot take."

system of the turned away his head as he answered—

'That I cannot take."

'Nay, on my soul you shall though. What, accept my Toledo and refuse this damned stuff! Od zooka, comrade, you reason backward, and place the saddle on the mule instead of the borse. Or mayhap you think the Master of Lindasy such a starved rat that he may not put out a beggarly twenty angels for a friend's sake without bungering for 't?'

'No, no, it was not that, but—'

'Then look at the clock, Master Elliot,' interrupted the good-natured Captain, assuming his sternest air; for five minutes you are still under my command, and you know that a breach of discipline is one thing I can never forgive. Now I command you put that leather bag in your pouch, and return it to me crammed with gold pieces some time between this and nillenium.'

It would have been an ungrateful offence not to have accepted a kindness so carnestly and freely offered. He compiled with the friendly command.
