What Came of

The three girls were going to spend a month at the seaside — Lydia, Rosa, and Julia Tafferal. Their aunt, Miss Hamlet, fter keeping them in suspense for weeks -now up in the skies of hope, now down in the dust of despair-at length made up her mind, and announced her decision-to go. "But I'm sure," she added, "I don't know what will come of it."

Charlotte Hamlet had thought fate rather cruel when, three years ago now, the heard of the death of her widowed sister, Mary Tafferel, and that the three daughters she left in the world had no protector, unless she herself became one. The girls had £300 a year conjointly—that is, £100 each, and could have kept a home over their heads by living together; but they were young for that, and, Miss Hamlet suspected, somewhat giddy. She was well-off herself, and had a roomy, pleasant house. It was not on that score she shrank from the prospect; but she was rather an invalid, nervous, and loving above all things a quiet life. However, there ap-peared to be no help for it, and she wrote to her nieces to come. "We must all have crosses," murmured poor Miss Hamlet, "and I suppose this will become one for me, but I have been pretty free from them hitherto, and must not repine.

The girls arrived at Stagbrook, Miss Ham-let's village home. The eldest of them was 23, the youngest 20. They turned out to be pleasant, sociable, and chatty; full of life and spirits, eager for any gaiety that might fall in their way, and very anxious, each of the three, to pick up a husband.

"Small blame to them either," freely spoke up Mrs. O'Malley, an intimate friend of Miss Hamlet's. "What do girls expect but to marry? and sure the young men are growing scarce !"

Nearly three years had elapsed since they came to Miss Hamlet, and there had been no change, when that lady bethought herself of taking them to the seaside, and bade them prepare themselves:

To get away anywhere was something: but the place she had fixed upon, Brightwater, was new and untried, not a dozen houses as yet in it. A grand hotel was just built, the size of which might, perhaps, make up for the scarcity of other accommodation. It was called the Royal Victoria, and it took its guests by the week, somewhat as a boarding-house does, or after the fashion of Searborough. Miss Hamlet had written to the Royal Victoria to make arrangements, Mrs. O'Malley, who had just returned from a fortnight's sejourn there, having praised it warmly.

"It is not exactly what I like," said Miss Hamlet to her nieces, as they sat at tea. "I have never tried the life myself, and I fear it will prove to be too familiar; but we can leave the hotel at the end of the first week for lodgings, if we choose. "Oh, aunt Charlotte," exclaimed Rosa, "it will seem like Paradise after this dreadful Stagbrook. "Dreadful Stagbrook!" repeated Miss Hamlet, gazing in amazement through her spectacles: "What do you mean by that,

Rosa dropped her high tone. "Well, aunt, Stagbrook is dull; you must know "I have never found it so, young lady, and I have lived all my life in it." "Yes, aunt; I suppose that makes a difference. We did not think Chichester

I wish the holiday to be pleasant to you all," resumed Miss Hamlet stiffly; "and I shall take Dorothy Krane."
"Dorothy Krane!" screamed all the three girls in chorus. "Dolly Krane!" "Yes; why not !" said Miss Hamlet. She will be a pleasant companion for you. "Why, Aunt Charlotte, Dolly won't have a decent thing to appear in!" exclaimed

"She'll do very well. People are not ex-pected to be fine at the seaside. Fancy dressing up at an hotel!" Lydia kicked Julia under the table, and Julia kicked Rosa. The young ladies were taking every smart thing they possessed with enough ribbons and fal-lols to fill a 'Nearly all Dolly's dresses are cotton!"

"If they are they are delicate and pretty," said Miss Hamlet. "More sugar, do you say, Julia? She has her gray silk for best; now that it's turned it looks as good as new. And Dorothy tells me-"Have you been to the parsonage, Aunt Charlotte ?" Yes; walked over this morning when you three were out shopping. Three hours you were gone! I was back long before you came in. One would think you wanted something at every shop in Stagbrook. "All the prints Dolly's got have been washed ever so many times, aunt."

"I dare say they have. They'll be just the thing for the seaside. Then she has that pretty figured muslin that was new last year; and for best she has her white. Not that, as I believe, she will require to wear it. Dorothy asked me whether it had better be taken or not."

"The white has been washed too," cried Lydia. "I wonder Mr. and Mrs. Krane can spare her. How will the children get on without Dolly, Aunt Charlotte?—and the parish ?-and the schools ?'

"As well as they can," answered Miss Hamlet. "All work and no play is not good for anybody-least good of all for the young. Dolly needs a change more than you do, and the tears stood in Mr. Krane's eyes when he thanked me for thinking of her. Another cup of tea, Lydia?"

The church and parsonage stood half a mile from Stagbrook. The Reverend Abel Krane, was the incumbent; a hard-working, conscientions man, with a flock of children, and a small income to keep them on. Dolly was the eldest; and she had to teach and take care of the others, not to speak of the running about in the parish, which was partly did for her mother, who was as hard-worked as the rector. Mrs. Krane, formerly Dorothy Hamlet, was first cousin to Miss Charlotte Hamlet and Mrs.

Brightwater was reached; and the Royal Victoria proved to be an imposing white green blinds. Miss Hamlet found it very comfortable, and liked it better than she had thought for.

A slight accident happened to her the day after her arrival. In stepping from a carriage, for she had treated the young people to a drive, she twisted her foot. It was nothing very serious, needing only a few days' rest. So Miss Hamlet reposed on one of the sofas near the window in the ladies' drawing-room, by day, feasting her eyes on the beautiful, ever-moving sea, and conversing placidly with another invalid lady, who had come to Brightwater to recover strength after an illness, and did not seem to be able to do it quickly.

For the girls this was just delightful. Not, of course, that they could rejoice ever a twisted ankle, but it was pleasant to be able to go about without the supervision of Aunt Charlotte. The hotel was not half schoolmaster for not having taught him full, but it was enjoying itself. There better.

One drawback the Miss Tafferels did find: not a soul of the male sex, then at the hotel, could be pronounced quite eligible. Three or four very young men, who were there with their mothers and sisters, and three or four middle-aged ones, who looked grave, and no doubt had wives at home, comprised the list. But the three sisters got a great deal of admiration; they were tall, stylish, and showy, with rather Spanish-looking faces, sparkling black eyes, and blue-black hair. Their manners in society were perfect; their repartees delightful. "Three charming girls!" de-clared young Mr. Pender, a dozen times a day, as often as he could get away from his tutor. "Never saw such beauties!"

Dolly Krane was nowhere beside them: eclipsed as a pale star by the brilliant moon. She was pretty in her way, but of style she had none. She only about came up to Miss Lydia's shoulder; a slender girl, retiring in manner, shrinking from strangers, rather than courting them. Not but that her face was a very pleasant one: fair, gentle, with earnest blue eyes, eversmiling and chiseled features; her ne, silky hair had a golden tinge on it. Dolly was kept down by her imperious cousins; imperious to her; and remained in her place accordingly. Sie was accustomed to think of them as rich and fortunate young ladies, quite above herself. A sweet nature, a sunny temper, utterly unselfish, and ever ready to help all the world; such was Dolly Krane.

Three or four days after the ankle was injured, Miss Hamlet was able to use it again without much trouble, and she went on that evening leaning upon Lydia's arm, to join the dinner in the public room. "Dolly," cried the young lady in a tone of command, "you had better change your place for this one next to Aunt Charlotte. And then you will be at hand, you know, to help her in anything she may want."

Now, by a skillful arrangement of the mistress of ceremonies, the elder people were placed together at the head of the table, and the younger ones at the foot; she had been young herself twenty years ago and she knew what was what. And perhaps a sort of disappointment crossed Dolly's heart at being called away from the lively company of her own age, to sit with the sober elders. The feeling passed in a moment. Dolly had only lived to serve others, not to indulge herself, and she sat down by Miss Hamlet with a loving smile and cheerful brow.

"Let it be your place for good, Dolly," said Lydia, as she moved away to her own. "Now I dare say, my dear, you would rather have stayed down there," said Miss

Hamlet. "Indeed I am glad to be with you, Aunt Charlotte," replied Dolly-for she had always called Miss Hamlet "aunt." "Please let me stav." But by that wonderful law of compensation said to exist in this world, while Dolly was taking her soup, there glided quietly into a vacant seat beside her a tall, handsome, distinguished-looking man, whose face Dolly liked at the first glance; took a fancy to, in fact. It was a very attractive face, its features pale and regular, eyes, hair, and whiskers of a dark brown, and a slight brown mustache.

Dolly passed him the salt. He thanked her, and that broke the ice. He began to talk to her, talked with her throughout the above list are requested to send in dinner, and spoke a little across Dolly to their dates to the ADVERTISER as soon as Miss Hamlet. His English was very good indeed—a slightly foreign accent being distinguishable at times; and now and then he hesitated for a word. Once he used a wrong word, and Dolly laughed.

"What is it mademoiselle?" he asked, laughing salso. What ought I to have Dolly told him. Though a retiring, modest girl, of innate refinement, she had none of the foolish shyness that some affect to have. And—she did not know how it was-but she felt as much at home with him as though she had known him for ten years. He could not be mistaken for anything but a gentleman, and he was certainly a very attractive one.

A Man Made Happy .- GENTLEMEN, -For five years I have been a great sufferer with Dyspepsia; the pain in the pit of my stomach was almost unbearable and life only seemed a drag to me. When I would go to sleep I would have horrible dreams, and my life became very miserable, as there was no rest either day or night. But with the use of only two bottles of Northrop & Lyman's VEGETABLE DISCOVERY this unmansion, with pillars and balconies and happy state has all been changed and I am a well man. I can assure you, my case was a bad one, and I send you this that it may be the means of convincing others of the wonderful curative qualities possessed by this medicine, that are specially adapted for the cure of Dyspepsia. A lady customer of mine had the Dyspepsia very bad, she could scarcely eat anything, and was troubled with pains similar to those I suffered with; and she cured herself with two bottles of Northrop & Lyman's VEGE-TABLE DISCOVERY. I wish you success with your medicine, as I am fully convinced that it will do all you claim for it.

(From Our Little Cnes.) Willie was asleep, and Dan was lonely. Willie is the minister's son; Dan is his dog. It was Sunday morning, and everyone was at church but these two friends. It was warm and sunny, and they could hear the preaching, for their house was next door to the church:

"Dan," said Willie, "it is hetter here than in church, for you can hear every word.

In some way, while Willie was listening he fell asleep. Dan kissed him on the nose; but when Willie went to sleep he went to sleep to stay and did not mind trifles. So Dan sat down with the funniest look of care on his wise black face, and with one ear ready for outside noises.

Now, the minister had for his subject "Daniel." This was the name he always gave Dan when he was teaching him to sit up and beg, and other tricks. While the dog sat thinking, the name "Daniel" fell on his ready ear. Dan at once ran into the church through the vestry door. He stood on his hind legs, with his forepaws close beside the minister, who did not see him, but the congregation did. When the minister shouted "Daniel" again, the sharp barks said "Yes, sir" as plainly as Dan could answer.

The minister started back, looked around and saw the funny picture. Then he wondered what he should do next; but just then through the vestry came Willie. His face was rosy from sleep and he looked a little frightened. He walked straight toward his father and took Dan in his arms and said:

"Please scuse Dan, papa. I went asleep and he runned away." Then he walked out with Dan, looking back on the smiling congregation. The preacher ended his sermon on Daniel as best he could, but he made a resolve if he ever preached again on the Prophet Daniel he would tie up that dog.

The child's story of "Jack, the Giant Killer," furnishes a striking illustration of the efficacy of small agencies towards the suppression of great evils, when indicionaly used. The daring exploits of brave little Jack remind us, in their resuits, of the wonderful achievements of Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets in battling with the giant, Disease. Relatively, the proportion between the youthful hero and old Blunder. bore is apparently not greater than that between the little "Pellets" and the relentless monster which preys upon the vitals. Yet, the "Pellets" comes off conqueror of conscipation, sick headache, biliousness and kindred ailments every time.
