Harold MacGrath's New Story

She saw the shiver that ran over him; she saw his eyes widen; she saw his hands knot in pressure over the rail. The man you are going to marry!

Abruptly, without explanation, he walked away, his shoulders settled, his head bent. It was her turn to be amazed. What could this attitude mean?
"Mr. Warrington!" she called.
But he disappeared down the com

CHAPTER VIII.

Elsa stared at the vacant doorway. She recognized only a sense of bewilderment. This was not one of those childish flashes of rudeness that had amused, annoyed and mystified her. She had hurt him. And how? Her first explanation was instantly rejected as absurd, impossible. They had known each other less than a fortnight. They had exchanged opinions upon a thousand topics, but sentiment had had no visible part in these encounters. They had been together three days on the boat, and once he had taken tea with her in Rangoon. She could find nothing save that she had been kind to him when he most needed kindness, and that she had not been stupidly curious, only sympathetically so. He interested her and held that interest because he was a type unlike anything she had met outside the covers of a book. He was so big and strong, and yet so boyish. He had given her visions of the character which had carried his manhood through all these years of strife and bitterness and temptation. And because of this she had shown him that she had taken it for granted that whatever he had done in the past had not put him beyond the pale of her friendship. There had been no degrading entanglements, and women forgive or condone all other a transgressions. A Woman's Reason.

She began to promenade the deck, still cluttered with luggage over which the Lascar stewards were moiling. Many a glance followed the supple, pleasing figure of the girl as she passed round and round the deck. Other promenaders stepped aside or permitted her to pass between. The resolute uplift of the chin, and the staring dark eyes which saw but inner visions, impressed them with the fact that it would be wise to step aside voluntarily. There were some, however, who considered that they had as much right to the deck as she. Before them she would stop shortshe. Before them she would stop short and as a current breaks and passes each side of an immovable object, they

It did not hearten one or excite hunger. Elsa would rather have lain down in her Canton lounging chair. The gong seemed out of place on the seas. There was but one vacant chair, and as she saw Warrington nowhere, Elsa assumed that this must be his reservation. She was rather glad that he would be beyond conversational radius. She liked to talk to the strange and lonely man, but she preferred to be alone with him when she did so. Neither of them had yet descended to the level of trifles; and Fiss had no wish to share with

Neither of them had yet descended to the level of trifles, and Elsa had no wish to share with persons uninteresting and uncompanion dable her serious views of life. Sometimes she wondered if, after all, she was not as old as the hills instead of only twenty-five.

She began as of old to study carelessly the faces of the diners and to speculase as to their characters and occupations. Her negligent observation roved from the pompous captain down to the dark picturesque face of the man Craig. Upon him her glance, a mixture of contempt and curtosity, rested. If he behaved to her, she was willing to declare a truce. In Rangoon the man had been drunk, but on the Irrawaddy boat he had been sober enough. Craig kept his eyes directed upon his food, and did not offer her even a furtive glance.

Mr. Pullen was asked for his opinion of the field open to the parcel post system, and expressed himself as firmly believing that in the rural astronomy of the parcels post had been as firmly believing that in the rural astronomy. as firmly believing that in the rural districts the parcels post had been greatly needed. The rich agricultural fields of the Dominion had, on account of the distances involved, been maccessible to the express companies' service, but the parcels post system, worked in conjunction with the post office and rural delivery services, would work out greatly to vices, would work out greatly to the advantage of the farmer, greatly bettering the conditions of rural life and, naturally, reacting to the bet-
