been confined hitherto to costume creations for American and French theatres, is embarking as a theatrical manager, but he will appeal only to a limited clientele. Poiret has a splendid garden near the Bois de Boulogne and has decided to use it as a setting for a theatre which he will install nightly beneath the trees surrounded by exotic blossosms.

During the day the garden will have the usual appearance, but 7 o'clock will see a transformation. Chairs will be brought from cellars by a trolley system. A portable stage will be wwheeled out from the garage, lights will be turned on and over all will be spread a rubber roof weighing nearly half a ton. Four hundred seats will be available, but none for critics, as Poiret intends presenting programs by new writers, as well as old favorites.

He has solved the problem of keeping his company in order by hiring a Russian director with Bolshevistic tendencies, but it is doubted if even he will be able to keep discontent from the ranks of the players, as Poiret has just announced that he does not think it a wise policy to strive for long runs and will limit his productions to ten nights.
