When Bonnes and Shaughnessy were dodging customs officers, the most of the merchants in St. Stephen secured the larger part of their American supplies through them. I may give the best idea of their doings by repeating the story that Shaughnessy told me, standing on the St. Stephen end of the bridge one evening not long ago.

We had our spies and knew when to move. Yes, of course we had certain officers on both sides of the line under our pay. Our great game was to keep the control of the Canadian officials in seizing fishing boats. Of course we got caught once in a while, and our stuff was seized; but profits were so big then that we could easily make up our losses. Many's the time I have made a fifty spot on one load! It was easy to make a hundred dollars a day. We never intended to start for the bridge with our teams or cross the river in our boats unless we were apprised by our scouts that the coast was clear. I'll tell you how McGary caught us one night, though. Jack Bonnes and I had a barrow load of wool to take across the bridge. I was wheeling the wool. We knew Noah McGary was in the toll house, and I had a man stationed there. When I came in sight he pulled the door to and held it, while I hurried to get by. McGary knew what add Bonnes coolly.

Ordinarily I would have surrendated the most of the fifty dollars. ceeded in getting out. Ordinarily I would have surrendered the wool; but this was a specially fine grade, and I did not want them to know I was smuggling it. I started back across the bridge for the St. Stephen side. McGary and I had a tussle, but I got clear all right. The next time I crossed to Calais, I was arrested for obstructing the officer and the scrape cost me $100 and costs. I never was much of a fellow to take chances, but Bonnes was more risky than I was. Many a time we were out all night on the river and on our trucks the next morning to avoid suspicion. For some reason or other the customs officers on the two sides of the river that plied his trade across the line. The last thing an American officer would do if he saw a smuggler with a load bound for the British side, would be to notify the British officers and vice versa. So illegitimate business and put a customs officer helped Jack put the butter aboard his boat. When he
