A GAME UNCLE SAM DOESN'T UNDERSTAND.

War, with the United States, is a new game. The civil war was merely an internal disturbance. It was a family affair, and the nation's weak points were not ruthlessly exposed to ridicule outside its own household. Now, however, the United States is fighting a foreign nation, and a European one at that, and the whole world is looking on with intense curiosity. This fighting with a foreign nation is a new episode in United States history. Independently of its being a source of any great extent, because it belongs to the generation which is now rapidly passing away. War, real war, will be quite a new experience for the present generation of Americans. That they can stand a high-grade education in the game is quite evident from the fact that they have already made. Our neighbors themselves must admit that it is comical to witness the quixotic warfare that has, up to date, characterized their encounter with Spain. Spain is admittedly a fourth rate power. The Americans acknowledge it, while they have given us all to understand that they themselves can look it creation. In spite of this admitted disparity in the warlike resources of the two combatants, we find the Americans non-plussed at the very outset. They rushed into the conflict with a blunder and a dash of impetuosity. To-day they hardly know where they are at. They don't know the game. They don't even know when the game started and when the scoring began. After they had been manoeuvring for some time before Havana they were dubious whether it was war or not, and to settle the point they got Congress to umpire the dispute. Congress decided that war was on and had been on for several days. This action on the part of Congress is like a litigant writing letters to himself to bolster up a weak case. Congress is no doubt a very potent factor in the conduct of the war, but in the event of international complications arising out of events that occurred during the period when it was doubtful if the game was on or not, the facts alone will be accepted as evidence. The decision of Congress will have no weight whatever in an international tribunal. But having satisfied themselves that the game was really on, the Americans proceeded to carry out their designs to take Cuba. This they expected to accomplish with a dash and a hurrah. They expected to capture the island, the Spanish fleet didn't show up in Cuban waters. It was evident again that the Americans didn't understand the game. However, they were before Havana to do business, and proceeded to attack everything in sight, whether it was anything to Hoyle or not. Their first adventure was the capture of a harmless lumber barge. The capture of this humble prize is about as far as Don Quixote's famous windmill encounter. The Americans, however, accepted the capture as a manoeuvre of real war. They gloried in the fact that they had drawn the first blood—a mere drop, it is true, but still blood. Then they made other Quixotic seizures, including half a dozen inoffensive freighters and schooners. As well might a butcher boast of his nerve in preparing six sheep for the market. Meanwhile Spain refused to respond to the enemy's challenges. Spain has already accomplished by a policy of inaction ten times as much as the Americans have through their "sharp and decisive" plan of campaign. Spain's answer to the American Quixotic crusade was crafty, diplomatic and effective. The Don assumed a lofty and magnanimous air. He, for his part, would be guilty of no policy or sheep killing. He announced to the world that he would give American vessels 30 days in which to get home. Such magnanimity almost took Uncle Sam's breath away. He was abashed and had no other alternative than to accept the ruling made by Spain and give Spanish vessels 30 days of grace, too. When the history of this war comes to be written this magnanimity of the Spaniards will be treated as a cunning move on their part to shame the United States into adopting a policy which meant a great deal more for Spain than for the United States. The United States has now put herself out of court. The lumber barge and the six other prizes must be given back, and Spain will fear no further reprisals of a similar nature for 30 days. A decidedly clever move on the part of Spain. As has already been stated it is a new game which Uncle Sam doesn't understand. But the game will be on in earnest before long and no one knows this better than our neighbors. History is being made very fast just now. Uncle Sam is making a great deal more of valuable information. He will undoubtedly crush Spain in the end, but meanwhile he is paying dearly for his experience. The future which the United States has to count on is something they have not foreseen. The United States has not abandoned their policy of isolation and accept responsibility as one of the ruling powers of the world. If the United States assumes the protectorate of Cuba or the Philippine Islands she must have an adequate navy to guard them. The present navy may be able to cope with Spain, but where would it be if the enemy were a first rate power? In order to make her navy effective the United States have learned that they must secure coaling stations all over the world. Today the American navy is homeless in the Pacific Ocean. Great Britain has been forced by the laws of neutrality to kick Uncle Sam out of Hong Kong, and when last heard of his navy was wandering at large over the wide, wide ocean. If the Spaniards repeat at Manila the game they have played in connection with the blockade of Havana, it will be a sorry day for Uncle Sam's squadron in the Pacific.

The Spanish-American war is pregnant with lessons, not only for the United States, but for the whole world. For the United States it means an expensive enlargement of their navy and the maintenance of a large standing army. The United States must abandon forever its shipping policy of providing for the future, and must protect its American shipping by a sudden disappearance of the presence of the discredited navy of a fourth rate power. Our neighbors have by this time, no doubt, got an idea of the navy they will require to protect their shipping against attack by a really formidable enemy.
