THE STRATEGY OF PIERROT

By WALTER ARCHER FROST.

Jean and White Elk had traveled fast. In the first light they had left the settlement, and it now lacked two hours before the evening gloom. Well chosen, they were, for that which they would do, for small Jean was all plausible and bland, well able to pervade, and with the young, to have his way; and the Elk was strong protection in his giant size. They swung on in easy confidence, and the gay tips of Jean's newly sewed up cap of otter swept the floor as they entered and stood for the first time before her eyes.

She had hoped that one was her father, but though disappointed, she addressed him as such. "You are a good man, I tell me," she turned to Jean, "is there another Verduil?"

Even Jean was still before her suffering, and his silence named the fate that must be hers. Dull pain fell on her body, and she left her through the night now in the early morning, when dumb and white as the snow beneath her feet, she went out upon the trail behind the messengers.

The rude cabin, which served as a bed for the two, was well proof against even his fire, and his fierceness had won him only manhood, regularly, but his mood made him intolerable, and this, with the forced inactivity, so new to him, was wearing down his strength.

Yet it was not these which
