HELEN MOIR

LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XIX.

A HAPPY APPERSONS THE STANDARD AND THE STANDARD AND TO THE NILLA—ASSER JACOIN UNEXPECTABLY PRESENTS HIMSELP.

Not for an hour did Mrs. Allerton enter the parlour to intrude upon the sacred privacy of that meeting between father and daughter. Her instinctive delicacy of feeling led her to understand that the peculiar solemnity of the occasion demanded the absence of all witnesses, even the most interested and sympathetic; and that which passed during the hour was something to be guessed at rather than rehearsed. A significant and expressive silence was maintained within that little room. Sounds faint and low, whispering sounds of human voices, came at times through the closed door into the passage, and out into the garden by the open window, where they fell with sweetest murmur upon the sultry air, and for a few brief moments on the ear of Ritchie Dunlop, whose intense but pardonable curiosity led him to stand for something like a minute close to the casement.—From the upper part of the garden Ritchie had been startled into something like consternation at beholding Mrs. Allerton enter the gate and pass up the path to the door of the villa, accompanie by David Bridgenorth.—To Ritchie, who had discovered who David Bridgenorth was, this had a meaning pregnant with importance, and the question instantly rose in his mind was, "is he gan that reveal himsel?" And so powerful was Ritchie's interest in this matter—an interest which the past ten years lad made it most rightful for him to, enfertain—that he was impelled by a Pšistless fascination to the side of window, where he watched till he heard Helen enter the room. Then, in the bursting exclamations which followed, he had his question answered, and knew that Helen and Bridgenorth were folded in each other's arms as parent and child. By waiting he might have heard smatches of the conversation that followed, for the lower sash of the large window was thrown fully up, and the prevailing quietness to the fore the part with the prevailing and the had ore the world. The wa was aware that he had any idea of the discovery which had been made, and he had reason to expect that they should at once make him acquainted with it, considering the peculiar relation in which he stood to the past. Yet, as the time passed, and neither Helen nor Mrs Allerton came to him, his kindly nature had full excuse for them in the strong absorbing feelings of the occasion, which might well swallow up for the time all their thoughts and feelings. He would have been still more ready to make allowance for the neglect had he known that during the course of the afternoon Edwin Allerton had entered the villa, and had for some time formed one of the group in the parlour, to whom the story of the discovery would have to be told. It did not matter; Ritchie patiently continued to work in the garden till nearly the close of the afternoon, when Helen's light footstep on the path reached his car, and, glaneing, up, he saw her coming towards him with a face flushed and full of emotion. He continued his work as if unconscious of her excitement.

The Colonization Railway.—The people of Montreal have exhibited a commendable enterprise in the manner in which they have showed forward the Montreal and St Jerome Colonization Railway. A scheme to give a bonus of $1,000,000 to that and other railways leading into the country north of the eity has been before the Conneil for two or three years but no decision was arrived at. Tired of waiting a few of the wealthy men of Montreal organized the Company above alluded to; and has been so far successful that the whole stock which it was thought necessary to issue has been taken up. A well-known railway contractor has agreed to construct the road at a figure within the original estimate. The survey will be preceded with as soon as the snow is off the ground.
