CHAPTER XVI.

NED GORDON MEETS IAN M'KENZIE—A NEW CONSPIRACY.

This was nearly a week after, and on the following morning they prepared to depart. They bade farewell to Hector and his aunt, and promising to return with a proof of Jeannie's marriage, if ever it should be obtained, to prove the villainy of M'Kenzie, prepared to go—Hector and Anne M'Leod tendering them their heartfelt wishes for success before they left. And, in addition to this, Hector pressed them to take a couple of horses which he presented to them in order to accelerate their journey and lighten their fatigue. These Gordon accepted, and promising that he would take the first opportunity of returning them, Jeannie and Flora had a short interview just before parting. Between the two a strong love had sprung up, and Flora was loath to part with Jeannie. She said that she felt saddened at the prospect of their separation, and that a depressing influence came over her as she thought of it. A feeling of insecurity, too, seemed to haunt her which she could not throw off. There had been no signs seen or heard either of the Caterans or of the M'Kenzies since the escape of Hector and Gordon from them, and the long silence, she felt sure, boded no good. That her enemies were gathering their strength she did not doubt, but she was almost loath to speak her thoughts to Hector, lest it should cause him needless dread and apprehension. Jeannie replied that her fears were only the result of the excitement through which she had passed, and which had doubtless much disturbed her mind. She would soon, she thought regain confidence. Moreover, there was a strong probability that Ian M'Kenzie had been captured by the soldiers who had gone in pursuit of him and the Caterans when the Chief and the others escaped. Flora shook her head, and imprinting a kiss on each other's brow, they parted.

The horses they rode on were strong limbed, sound steped, animals, and as the morning was bright and clear, they set out with tolerably light hearts, though hope and fear vacillated in their bosoms as to the result of their mission. Ned Gordon desired the proof of his sister's marriage for two good reasons—the first was to vindicate her honour; the second was for the sake of Flora Macgregor, for deep down in his heart was seated the conviction that Ian M'Kenzie would yet plot against her. But in possession of this proof she might be able to fight against him.

Ned had business in Glasgow, and intended to go there first and finish it, and then hold direct for Edinburgh, and rest not until he had made every possible effort to accomplish the object on which he was intent. With the former object in view, then he and his sister rode almost directly southward in the direction of Torridon, and talked to each other of the happy days of their childhood, and of the pleasant bright scenes they had passed through.

It was an engaging theme—childhood's scenes are so to everyone—and neither of them observed that they were rapidly approaching three men who were coming towards them—three men fully armed and attired in kilts. The road at the place was not broad, but afforded good footing. At either side was thick brush and rank heather. The men in front halted while Gordon and his sister were still a considerable distance from them, and, after holding a hurried and apparently excited consultation together, they darted to the sides of the road—two to one side, and the other taking the opposite—and hurriedly concealed themselves, so that not a trace of them was to be seen as the two friends rode forward to the spot.

BERLIN.—A case which excited considerable interest was tried before Judge Lacourse at the Division Court sittings, in which a Mrs. Gordon of Waterloo Village sought to recover damages from Messrs. Koehler & Brenit, hotel keepers at that place, for having supplied her husband with whisky after being forbidden to do so. The evidence adduced was of a contradictory character, and would puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer to eliminate from it anything like "the whole truth and nothing but the truth." The plaintiff swore that defendant, in September last, were notified not to sell her husband any more liquor; that in spite of this they did furnish him with whisky; and that in consequence he became so outrageously violent as to necessitate his arrest by the Town Constable. The defendant testified that they did not supply Gordon with liquor at the time alleged, and received no written notice from his wife until the latter part of December. Damages were laid at $40 in each case, but His Honor the Judge reserved his decision in the matter until 1st of February.

MANUFACTURE OF COCOA.—We will give an account of the process adopted by Messrs. James Epps & Co., manufacturers of dietetic articles, at their works in the Easton Road, London.—See article in Cassell's Household Guide.
