Mrs. McKinlock was a cheery old woman, but as the moonlight brings to the young dreams of the future, just so surely does it turn the thoughts of the old to the past; the days when the home was all her own, and she had her husband and two strong young sons to care for.

She had always been an active, energetic woman, living in each day as it came, and not even yet could she fully realize that she was an old woman, whose husband lay in the churchyard yonder, and whose sons had grown beyond the need of her ministrations. Rare tears rolled down her cheeks as she rose and stepped down into the yard, straining her eyes to see across the fields north of the house the dim mass which she knew was the little stone church.
