

Regiment left Saint John, on the 13th day of February, 1813, for Quebec, by the Valley of the Saint John. After a brief halt at Quebec, the Regiment again resumed its march for Upper Canada where on its arrival in the vicinity of the battle-ground, the men were marched into immediate action.

The history of the events which took place in those days in Upper Canada, is, without doubt, familiar to the numerous readers of THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW, and it is therefore unnecessary to repeat them now; suffice it to say, that, if the Captains, Subaltern Officers and Men of the gallant 104th were "Oxley Colonists," they performed deeds of valor, which, if done by some of the Veteran Battalions of Britain, would have been extolled as the very refinement of heroism, and caused a medal to have been placed upon the breast of every one of the survivors at the close of the War.

The achievements of the 104th during its brief existence and career in Upper Canada, have left an impress upon the minds of the people of this Province, which will not be very soon eradicated. When the Regiment left New Brunswick, it was up to the full strength required; on its return home at the time of its reduction in 1817, their was hardly one third of its original number remaining; all the others, having left their bones on the soil, which they had left here to defend.

The only man of the Regiment now living in Saint John is WILLIAM MUMFORD, who was one of its Drummers during the whole period of its existence. For several years subsequent to the close of the war in 1815, the militia of this Province, had permission to "stand at ease," but the volunteer artillery, never lost its vitality, and could every year, muster the requisite number of men to fire the Royal salutes on the 4th day of June, in honor of the birth day of Old King George the Third, up to the close of his life in 1819. In consequence of the sudden death of Captain Andrew Crookshank, about 1816, the command of the Artillery devolved on Captain David Waterberry, who, with two of his sons had joined the Battery some years before, and during his command, the muster roll once more attained to its full strength. After the decease of Captain Waterberry; the command was given to his son John Waterberry, who held it for several years; and then made way for Thomas Barlow, Merchant, who was appointed Captain: and it was during the term of his command that the writer of these papers joined the Battery in 1827.
