

concentrated upon one thing and they are a success. He made a speech in 1866, and it was an appeal for India. I bought a copy and read it. They had plenty of money in their treasury but they couldn't get any men to go there. And the old man stood up there for an hour and a half and plead and wept for India. Then he fainted away and they carried him out into the vestibule and worked over him for some time. When he came to they said to him: "Do you know where you are?" And for a few moments he seemed bewildered, and then he said, "Oh, yes, I know now. I was making an appeal for India before the General Assembly. I didn't quite finish my speech. Take me back." But they told him that if he went back, he would do it at the peril of his life. But he said, "I must make one more plea for India," and George H. Stuart said it was one of the sublimest scenes of his life when they brought that old man back, and the tears flowed all over the hall. The old man crept up to the desk again and said: "Is it true, fathers and mothers, that you have no more sons to give for India? The Lord Jesus has been calling for years for men to go and preach His gospel there, and the call has been denied, and word has come back that Scotland has no more sons for India. When the queen calls for men for her army Scotland is very anxious to get her sons enlisted; but the Lord wants them and the response is: 'We cannot spare our sons to go to India.' If it is true, although my health is broken down and I have come here to die among my friends, if it is true, I will pack up to-morrow and be off to the shores of the Ganges and let those men there
