her power of prolonged resistance. The allies, expected, will be content with a little when to gain more they must prepare for a conflict the end of which is far off in the future. But the writer of "The War Beginning in Earnest" a patent for a wood-cutting machine, is not a man to influence his readers. He startles by paradoxes which no one will accept, and then prephecies with a boldness which railroads, grates, and stoves. The cuttin carries little conviction. It is a singular proof of the ignorance which prevails in Russia when a public writer deems that Europe will believe hand, can cause it to cut a log which has in the profound strategy of the abandonment rolled on to a slide, into wood of any de the assertion that "the Russians crossed to the in cutting wood for the Central Rai North side as one changes his dress or selects The parties interested are desirous of dis another path;" but we may point out the folly of an interest in the entire patent, or of of losing the respect of the world for what was the right for one or two of the States, o really achieved by an absurd claim to complete success. The Northern Bee is as confident. In its predictions as in its boasts. We are told that the purple dress of Sebastopol is put off for the success they claim for the success the succ a time, but that the Czar will give it a new one vention. Further information may be of by the genius of Todtleben and his companions. of Fowler and Wells, New York. The petty victory of the Western Powers was unworthy of record, and will be speedily effaced.

Their sole trophies are crape and black dresses, vented an improved washing machine and their armies are reduced to the verge of dispair.
Whatever Russia suffered was only through a momentary want of preparation—because she had not sufficient railroads, or guns of the same range as those of the enemy. Thus she has met with a slight reverse; but, on the other hand, she defeated the British wherever she in a sort of light frame. Of this fram met them, while the French, in their last victory, will instinctively recur to the words of Pyrrhus. turning the clothes at intervals as the So the writer goes on:—The French loan only passes over them until the clothes are successful by means of the Jews; the Anglo- pletely purified. The power required to French alliance may be broken up in a day by any reverse; nations of Europe, momentarily estranged, are rapidly assuming their former sympathy for Russia. The army of Gortchakoff forts in this line as tending to relieve the is unasailable; the allies have landed on spots amount of household drudgery! this bra ish misstatements, not from a desire to expose them, but rather that they may throw a light on the language of the Czar and of his friends John Dick, 312 Broadway, New York, who declare that the West has gained all that it can fairly desire, and that Russia willing to concede all that she decently can. It must be remembered that all writing in St. Petersburg is at least negatively official.. If not the direct legs of boots can be made of linen, cloth, production of a government agent, it contains only what such an agent will approve the Northern Bee may, therefore, be considered The bottoms are made of leather in the to speak what the Czar wishes his subjects and neighbors should believe. There can be no doubt that the war is spoken of as only now beginning in earnest it is the wish of the for indoor or city wear. We like the city to be the company therefore, be considered the bottoms are made of leather fixther way, while the legs may be made of any and cheap material which will be warm, d and sufficiently tight for all purposes, especially the constitution of the constitut imperial Cabinet that the Russians should be tops with the improvement far better the encouraged to obstinacy or their opponents more expensive leather tops. For ordinary wear, no the peacemakers of the West, and all the more permanent is required than good clot irresolute or secretly sympathetic in Europe, are to be confirmed in Russian leanings by the Spectacle of an indomitable people and the prospect of an endless war.

But if the idea was good, the execution has been indifferent. We can gather nothing from the present document but an encouragement to persevere. An apology for ill success would command more respect than a gross and absurd denial. But what could carry the greatest weight would be a statement detailing some of that means by which Russia can support the campaigns that are to come. It is useless to affect a mystery about things which cannot be concealed, or, in such a contest as this, to pass over with affected contempt the opinions which are current among men. Throughout the Old and New Worlds there is but one language. Everyone speaks of the humiliation of Russia. Statesman compare the days when the implied wish of a Czar was enough to stay any scheme of improvement throughout the East with the present time, when hasteily raised levies of Asiatics have defeated his disciplined troops, and the Ottoman Porte weak and distracted though it be, never gives a thought to the Soversign wheel a contestative before was all though it be, never gives a thought to the Sovereign whose representative before was all powerful. Two years since military critics, We learn that on Sunday, the 9th ult. man of sober judgement, declared that both history and their own observation induced them to place the Russian troops on an equality with any that could be brought against them. Now it is proclaimed, without denial, that they are inferior to those of four nations whom the chance of war has gamesed to them to place the Russian troops on an equality with any that could be brought against them. Now chance of war has opposed to them, the sumption is that the army of the smallest European Power might face with assurance of success an equal force of the Czar. It is said that more than 300,000 Russians have been buried since the Pourley was presented in the bank of the river, in campany with a boy, he ventured too near the water, attempting to turu round, lost his foothowas psecipitated into the stream. The obeing very raoid, he was hurried along over the Falls—about 15 feet high—and over the Falls—about 15 feet high—and over the role being very raoid, he was hurried along the role being very raoi buried since the Pruth was crossed; it is said upon the rocks below, despite his most su that the recruiting for fresh levies is every day man efforts to safe himself; but strai more difficult; it is said that the nobles are say, through the miraculous interposition discontented and disloyal, angry at the loss of these who till their lands, and anxious for the ease and luxuries of peace. The serfs who supply the armies are stated to dread the hour which drags them from their home to fight in a war which they feel to be objectless and endless. Religion, even under the goad of the priesthood, ceases to inspire them with enthusreputious aid of a neutral port. These are the opinions which prevail in ees every land beyond the Russian boundaries. They may be exaggerated—they may be false; but they exist, and influence the world. It is for the rulers and the press of Russia to deny them if they be untrue, to correct them, if they be exaggerated. Let the Northern Bee descend to details if it has anything that can be truly to details, if it has anything that can be truly or even plausibly urged. Let it labor to convince men of judgment, and not to impose on the returned a verdict "That Catherine H. prejudiced or the ignorant. It may then in some measure benefit the Power which it serves; at present that class of friends from which people commonly pray to be preserved.

LARGE TREES.—A grove of immensely large trees has been recently discovered in California, in comparison with which, it is said, the largest trees in the old world are only like stunted shrubs. One of them is described as being 350 feet high and 107 feet in circumference. Several of them have been cut down, partly out of curiosity; but the American press call upon the report on his return. Nelson Church was the principal witnebeing present when the woman expired. Stated to him, that "her husband had potentially in speaking of them, says:—

These California monsters are, we doubt not, of the same genus, though perhaps not of the exact species, of the ancient cedars of Lebanon. The California grove is in about the same latitude, the same altitude (4,500 feet above the sea), and has the same climate as those nighty forests of the mountains of Lebanon, from which King Hiram supplied the timber for the building of Solomon's Temple. Of those Lebanon forests only some half dozen gnarled and shattered relics now remain near the summit of that lofty range; while in A new and useful machine for making the summit of that lofty range; while in California we have a grove of the most magniticent specimens coeval with Solomon and David. There they have stood, and have David. There they have stood, and have continued to grow, while kingdoms, empires and dynasties have risen and disappeared; and there they stand, the living patriarchs of three thousand years!
