As to Vera, he greets her at once as a sister—haw of the most approved type, regardless of the fact-forgetful of it, I think—thatthis is only the second time he has ever seen her

At the Woodsley station they find a brougham waiting for them. It seems to them almost sinful to enter anything on such a glorious evening, and seeing an extremely proper dog-cart in the distance, sent to meet some man or men who have not arrived. The day is many through the still sweetness of the coming evening towards. The Friars. The sea seems very close to them at every opening in the trees that guard each side of the road grat of the ocean can be seen. The coast seems to them very much to resemble the coast near Greycourt, although this is so much farther on that dissimilarity might reasonably be expected. The day is gradually nearing its grave, but still the warm claspings of the dying sunlight surround and hold them, touching the same of the surround and sprig to burning with the same of the surround and sprig to burning with the same of the surround and sprig to burning with the seem on fire with it, and the blue sky overhead has gained through it a richer hue; whilst the swaying, laughing, riotous trees seem to whisper to them assurance of love and gladness and delight.

It is que five o'clock when the warrive and enter the spaceous hall of The Friars, that now is filled with a delicate sombre light. A crimson stream from a painted window, somewhere in the distance, casts a flood of glory, blood-red at Vera's feet, and a comfortable inking of spoons elinking against chias smites upon their ears. CHAPTER XLIII.

ti is a deliciously cosy apartment full of colour, and sweet with a delicacate undefinable perfume. Each room in the house, through a whim of Lady Riversdale's has been painted of Lady Riversdale's has been pointed and pranked out to represent a flower, and this one in which they now stand declares itelf a pomegranate with charming distinctness. It is rich in warm but subtle shading, and the faint lingering hues of the yet sunny twilight throw through the windows a subduing influence ove tint and carving.

There is a momentary, an almost imperceptible, hush as the girls enter, but it dies the instant it is born and conversation flows on again as though that little check had never been. Just one or two of the men perhaps, continue to be a little distrait for the best part of a minut whilst they take the newcomers to pieces, and declare them in the end faultless.

whilst they take the newcomers to pieces, and declare them in the end faultless.

Vera looks round her with a little thoughtful gaze that is part of her obarm. She fis been introduced to her host, Lord Riversdale, a particylarly silent man, as she finds to her joy, and sinking into a deeply oushioned seat she gives herself up to a mental analysis of those around. There is the usual mixture of the human types that in itself is delightful. Modern endurance is not proof agains satiety. "Variety is charming," says an old and sound proverb. To Vera it is a very feast to sit here, and once more watch and listen to the various members of the universal family to which she too belongs.

Hare isthe sort stout young man, beaning with good hunour, who talks a great deal ond has many listeners, there is the tall, lank young man, who looks his conversation, and that into but one pair of eyes at a time. A turn of the e. ad shows one the dowager who still refuses to be old, and near her the little chit of sixteen who declines altogether to be young, each a ridiculous foil to the other. Over there, lounging negitiently and in perfect safety against the door, stands the lady-like for, who wears an eyeglass only because he doesn't want it, whilst in the middle of the crowded room, terribly en evidence is the man who won't wear one, although every spindle-shanked table and dainty gimerack tremble to their full when he is near.

A skirmish of wit between them. O, how full of briers is this working-day world! The soft subdued laughter is still going on. The hum of conversation becomes louder as Lady Riversdale pushes back the portiere and lends the girls into the small drawing-room.
