CJSR News Director is an Ace

Ron Sears

Amy Santoro practices her script minutes before her news broadcast. Santoro, who just recently became CJSR's News Director, plans to make some positive changes at the station.

by Shannon Taylor

Newly appointed CJSR news director Amy Santoro is laying her cards on the table, and she's starting with the Ace of Clubs.

Attempting to increase the profile of the station's news and public affairs department, Santoro plans to introduce a host of new programs to the city's airwaves. The Ace of Clubs, the first of these programs, will begin Thursday, Sept. 14, at 8:15 a.m.

"The show will focus on the various clubs on campus, and will be hosted by the clubs commissioner (Jeff Edlund)," Santoro says.

"We think the program will be a great way for students to learn what the campus clubs are about, and organization members can learn about broadcasting," she adds.

The program will air biweekly — featuring a different club each week.

"This program, along with others I hope to start, will demonstrate our commitment to reflect campus and community concerns," Santoro notes.

Replacing Tasha Larson as news director, Santoro is a former University of Alberta political science student. In her new position, Santoro aims to make some positive changes to her department.

"I'd like to put together a solid news team that gets out there and breaks stories. We have the capacity to do that."

"I also want to make our listeners think about issues other media in the city ignore. It's the people at this station who are dedicated to some form of social change," Santoro says.

She invites students to attend a recruitment meeting Tuesday, Sept. 17, in room 142 SUB.
