

the highest credit for the humane and delicate manner in which their duties were performed." It is impossible to contemplate the fate of Geelhan without horror. His age could not have been much under fifty-years. He was not, therefore, young, thoughtless, reckless of consequences. He was not hardened by a course of dissipation, if we may judge from the evidence produced in the trial. He was comfortable as regards this world's goods, for his position in life, and accounted respectable by those amongst whom he lived. And yet he has died on the scaffold for one of the most diabolical murders ever recorded. Men do not become depraved all at once. There must have been something radically bad in Geelhan's nature; but bad as this doubtless was, there must also have been a long and secret yielding to depraved passions of some kind or other before the deplorable end was reached. He was not only convicted of having murdered his brother-in-law in circumstances of cold-blooded cruelty; but he was suspected, and not without good reason, of having put his wife to a violent end, both his victims being quiet, sober, and industrious persons. The severest penalty which the law could inflict could alone atone to the public for such crimes. His fate is an awful warning to all. It seems to have made a deep impression upon the public mind. We hope the impression will also be lasting.
