Interest Rates.

If anyone should propose to fix the rental of real estate by law it would be regarded as absurd, yet this state, in common with many others, maintains a legal rate for money, and a member of the legislature thinks he can confer a favor on borrowers by reducing the legal rate from 6 to 5 per cent. In the light of economics there is no more reason for putting a legal limit on the rental of money than for putting it upon a house or a store, and in the light of philanthropy there is not nearly as much a shelter is absolutely necessary for every man while a money loan is not very often absolutely necessary; real estate cannot go from the place where it is not in demand to the place where it is; it is always in a certain sense a monopoly article; while capital moves easily in response to demand, and consequently there are no such variations in the rate of interest between different localities as there are in real estate rentals. Interest laws are a survival of the period when commerce was undeveloped and borrowing was for the relief of destitution. The greatest favor that the law can do the class of small borrowers, who do not now get the lowest terms, is to afford capitalists every encouragement to lend leaving the rate of interest perfectly free, and affording ample facilities for the collection of debts. The competition of lenders will then lower the rate of interest which the law will always fail to do.—New York Journal of Commerce.
