

debates. Perhaps what is wrong with the Senate is that we are not public-relations conscious. We are not letting the people of Canada know what is happening here. And I think, perhaps a little presumptuously because I am the most junior senator in this chamber, that the Senate should, in addition to its existing responsibilities, adopt multiculturalism as a means to promote national unity. We should take this concept, this ideology, and try to make Canadians more aware of it. Canadians should know the purpose and the intent of the policy of multiculturalism because, I believe, that multiculturalism has given Canadians that common denominator which enables all of us to stand up and say, "Je suis canadien;" "Sono Canadese;" "I am Canadian."

On motion of Senator Cottreau, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, May 30, at 8 p.m.
