MURRAY'S GOES INTO OBLIVION

Famous New York Cafe,
One of the White Way's
Bright Lights, Closes Its Doors.

(N. Y. Tribune.)

The dry way will claim another victim Sunday night, when Murray's Roman Gardens, for years one of the luminous spots of the White Light district, closes its doors.
According to Charles W. Groll, president of the corporation which acquired the restaurant in West Forty-second Street from the Murray estate a year ago, it is impossible to maintain an elaborate cabaret with an expensive orchestra under arid conditions. It doesn't pay, and that is the sole reason for closing, he said. There never has been an arrest of any man connected with the place for violation of the prohibition laws, he added. Twice the premises have been searched but no liquor was found.
What Murray's meant to the bon vivant of fifteen years ago may be gathered from The Tribune of Sunday, February 1, 1909. "There are many restaurants in New York where one may dine well," said one article, "but it has remained for Murray's to transport the epicure of Gotham to the luxurious appointments of ancient Rome in all their original glory. All that fancy and the means to carry fancy into realization can call into existence Murray's has achieved."
"From the din and turmoil of Broadway the diner is wafted into a classical atmosphere. He is in a gorgeous palace, full of all that is precious and beautiful to the Romans. . . . The consummate skill with which this Roman palace of the twentieth century has been made to reproduce the lavish splendor of ancient times probably has never been equaled, much less surpassed, and Murray's is consequently one of the most magnificent of New York's magnificent sights."
"Add to this ingenious and ravishing beauty a cuisine and a cellar of remarkable perfection," etc.
Murray's without that cellar of remarkable perfection can no more hope to continue its existence today than it could have in 1909, say the mourners. So on Sunday night it will become a memory, with Shaw's and the Knickerbocker and the Manhattan and others. When the building reopens four months hence its stately Roman facade will lend the "classical atmosphere" to a row of shops.
