Pointers On Training For Young Athletes. This article deals with middle distance running. The half and mile runs are the ones high school athletes compete in. The half-mile requires more endurance and less speed than the sprints. To run a half mile in 2 minutes and 15 seconds a runner should cover distance as follows: First 220 yards in 31.2 seconds. Second 220 yards in 33.2 seconds. Third 220 yards in 34.2 seconds. Fourth 220 yards in 35.2 seconds. To run a half mile in two minutes "hat," he should run as follows: First 220 yards in 28 seconds. Second 220 yards in 29 seconds. Third 220 yards in 30 seconds. Fourth 220 yards in 31 seconds. The first three weeks jog a mile a day at a seven-minute gait. After finishing this distance, walk half a mile to cool off and allow the heart and respiration to return to normal. The last three weeks jog a mile a day at a seven-minute gait for each mile. After finishing this distance, walk a half mile. Then reduce the distance to a mile and a half, but increase the speed so that each three-quarter mile is run in four and one-half minutes. Walk as before. The third three weeks run the same distance, running each three-quarter mile in four minutes 10 seconds. The last three weeks run three-quarter mile each day; rest; sprint 60 yards four times. Never run to your limit except in a race, unless making a trial. A mile requires more endurance than the half and your judgment of pace must be keen.
