The Dutch War in Sumatra.

The Dutch appear to have suffered a repulse in their Sumatran war, and the he recall of their troops, announced in this morning's despatches, wil lower their prestige considerably. The history of this affair—or what is known of it—is briefly as follows: The Kingdom of Atchin, one of the native possessions in husband and paramour, inflicting serious that the Atchinese wolated their engagements with the Dutch, and were not only guilty of robberies of goods, but of men, whom they sold as slaves. Hence came a declaration of war, although other causes, not well understood at this distance, would appear to have been mixed up therewith. The matter has recently been up before the Dutch Government, when the Minister acknowledged that his information on the subject was too meagre to rely upon.

The intelligence seems to have had a discouraging effect in the Dutch Parliament. One of the opposition members declared, when the news was confirmed by the Government, that this was the last blow to Dutch authority in the East, as they had neither a sufficient number of soldiers nor a sufficient navy to bring the expedition to a successful close. The Minister rebuked him for his want of patriotism, and stated that the Government was acting in concert with England and France in the matter. The force ordered to Atchin consisted of four thousand infantry, artillery, and cavalry, besides two lundred and fifty officers and one thousand coolies. The strength of the Atchinese is unknown, though the latest despatches state that they immensely outnumber the Dutch. injuries on the latter.
