

PREFACE.

THIS Story may be very properly called a narrative of facts; the authoress having done little more than narrate what she has seen and heard, and, with a touch of fiction, linked fact with fact, so as to form a continuous narrative. It is different from other stories, because the facts make it so, and have not before been published. That it may prove pleasant and profitable to all who may read it, is the sincere desire of the
