Poetry.

"TWELVE YEARS HAVE FLOWN."

BY PROSPER M. WERNER.

Twelve years have flown since last I saw
My birthplace and my home of youth;
How oft its scenes would memory draw,
Her tints the pencillings of truth:
Unto that spot I come once more;
The dearest life I have ever known;
And still it wears the look it wore,
Although twelve weary years have flown.

Again upon the soil I stand
Where first my infant footsteps stray'd;
Again I view my father's land,
And wander through its pleasant shade:
I gaze upon the hills, the sky,
The verdant banks with flowers o'ergrown,
And while I look with glistering eyes,
Almost forget twelve years have flown.

Twelve years are flown: 'tis words are brief,
Yet in their sound what fancies dwell!
The joys and woes remember'd well:
The hopes that fill'd the youthful breast,
How many a one o'erthrown!
Deep thought, that long have been at rest,
Wake at the words, twelve years have flown!

The past! the past! a saddening thought,
A withering spell is in the sound!
It comes with memories deeply fraught
Of youthful pleasure's giddy bound:
Of forms that roved life's sunniest bowers,
The cheris'd few for ever gone:
Of dreams that fill'd life's morning hours,
Where are they now? Twelve years have flown!

A brief but eloquent reply!
Where are youth's hopes—life's morning dream?
Seek for the flowers that floated by
Upon the rushing mountain stream!
Yet gems beneath that wave may sleep,
Till after years shall make them known:
Thus golden thoughts the heart will keep,
That perish not, though years have flown.

FOUNTEIN OF ANGELS.

BY HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW.

When the hours of Day are number'd,
And the voices of the Night
Walk the better soil that slumber'd,
To a lovely calm delight:
Ere the evening lamps are lighted,
And, like phantoms grim and tall,
Shadows from the fital freight
Dance upon the parlor wall:
Then the forms of the departed
Enter at the open door,
The beloved ones, the true-hearted,
Come to visit us once more:
He, the young and strong, who cherish'd
Noble longings for the strife,
By the roadside fell and perish'd,
Weary with the march of life:
They, the holy ones and weakly,
Who the cross of suffering bore,
Fulfil'd their pale hands so meekly,
Spoke with us on Being's shore:
And with them the Being Beatific,
Who unto my youth was given,
More than all things else to love me,
And is now a saint in heaven.
With a slow and noiseless footstep
Comes that messenger divine,
Takes the vacant chair beside me,
Lays her gentle hand in mine.
And she sits and gazes at me
With those deep and tender eyes,
Like the stars, so still and saint-like,
Looking downward from the skies.
Utter'd not, yet comprehended,
Is the spirit's voiceless prayer,
Soft rebukes, in blessings ended,
Breathing from her lips of air.
Oh, though soft depress'd and lonely,
All my fears are laid aside,
It is but remember only
Such as these have lived and died!

BOOKS.

Books are not only the friends of individual solitude, but also of the family circle. They contribute to bind it together, to fill up deficiencies, to cover flaws, to make it closer and brighter and firmer. By engaging the thoughts, improving the taste, and exciting the kindly feelings of the members of a household, they render each one more considerate and gentle, and more useful and agreeable to the rest. They insensibly introduce mental grace and refinement, and not only so, but refinement and grace of manners, wherever they become favorites. Show us a family in which the best and purest authors are loved and read, and we care not in what nominal rank of society they are stationed, or what may be their daily avocations; but we will answer for them, that vigour and coarseness have no place at their meetings, and that domestic peace is a dwelling among them. The domestic services which books are qualified to perform, are particularly valuable when the business and bustle of daylight are over, and the active interests of life are hushed into slumber under the brooding wings of night. The master of the house comes home from his office, counting-room, or workshop, the children come home from their schools, or places of employment, the mother's household duties are done, and they sit down together. What shall they do with the impending hours to keep them from hanging heavily. We suppose that there are some families, in town and country, who find, if there is no party to go to, or no place of public amusement to offer its attractions, such as they may be, or nothing particularly interesting to discuss in the evening, the day, or the character or fortunes of their neighbours, that the long winter evenings, by which we mean the evenings of six months in our year, are apt to move off rather slowly and wearily. This would not be so, we are persuaded, if they would call in to their assistance one or two of the friends which they would find in good books. How much more sweetly and pleasantly, not to say profitably, the hours would then glide away!

What honest friends, what sympathizing companions, what excellent instructors they are! How can a man be really solitary when these and nature are with him and around him? How can it be said of him, that he is without society, even though no man be near him, when he can sit down in his closet with the best and brightest minds which ever dwelt, and learned in residences of clay; with the master spirits of all time; with the souls of the mighty living and the mighty dead; the dead who are yet living; with ancient and modern lawgivers, philosophers, and bards; with moralists; with civilians and divines; with navigators and travellers; with the explorers of nature and the professors of art; with patriots; with saints; with martyrs; with Apostles of Christ; with prophets; with sages; with all that is great and good in the world, that is, that these are alone? Who shall say that in his sorrow he is without consoling; that in his trials and perplexities, and the various conditions of his mind and feelings, he is without spiritual advisers?—Greenwood.

LECTURES OF THE MERCANTILE LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

From the Montreal Transcript.

Pursuant to notice, the introductory lecture, delivered before the members of the above mentioned Association, at the large room of Donegan's hotel, on Thursday evening, by the Rev. Henry Wilkes, A. M., of Zion Church, in this city. His Excellency the Earl of Elgin, who has kindly condescended to become the patron of the Association, was present, as also Lady A. Langton, Miss Campbell, the Hon. Mr. Hays, and Lord Mark Kerr. The distinguished visitors occupied seats on the platform, to the right of the Rev. Lecturer, together with the President and Secretary of the Association. The other side being occupied by the officers of the Association.

We never have seen so large an audience congregated on a like occasion, in Montreal. The splendid room, which is in the city, with the exception of the room over the Bonsecours market, being completely filled, and every seat occupied by the arrival of the Governor General and his suite.

We listened to one of the ablest and most eloquent lectures it has ever been our happiness to hear, and only regret that in consequence of the crowded state of the room, and our being, therefore, compelled to stand throughout the evening, we had no opportunity of giving more than a mere brief sketch from memory of what we had originally intended to have noticed more at length.

The Rev. Mr. Wilkes having sat down, His Excellency the Governor General rose, and having motioned for opportunity, he arisen as a mark of respect, to retain their seats, proceeded to express the pleasure he felt in having become the Patron of an Institution which had as its avowed aim as the Mercantile Library Association. He would, he said, be always happy to foster and encourage institutions of that description, whether in the character of private gentlemen, or in the high office he held as the representative of Her Majesty. It gave him the greater pleasure to accede to the request of the members of the Association, in so far as it was one intended to improve the minds of young men who would hereafter be the commercial men of the country. His Lordship alluded to the foundation of the Association by some of the leading merchants of the city of Montreal, one of the founders he believed was then seated near him—and to its having been afterwards given up to the young men who now sustained it, and expressed his satisfaction at the creditable manner in which it was sustained. He spoke of the high character of the British merchant, whom it was the object of these young men to emulate; and in allusion to the commercial possession, observed, that practised with honor and integrity, it always led to respectability, to wealth and high distinction.

In urging the young men he was addressing to be sure that their aims were correct, and the object of their pursuit worth the labor of pursuing, and when satisfied that the aim was right, to pursue it with unwearied energy. His Lordship spoke of an anecdote he had lately read of one of the most distinguished men of any age or country (he alluded to Watt) who, when examining the right of reservation of patents, was struck with the singularity of ideas in many patents for which a right had been obtained, to certain ideas which had floated in his own brain, but which had never been brought to maturity, in consequence of their imperfection—while the patents themselves had sunk to insignificance and were forgotten. From this Watts saw the necessity of thoroughly understanding principles before those principles were put in practice; and His Lordship related the anecdote as an illustration of the necessity of any person in whatever situation of life he held a high position, being thoroughly imbued with the elements of his profession. The carpenter and mason, he said, must know much; but the architect should know all. The sailor and steersman needed skill, but how much more was needed by the master of the ship who directed their efforts; or to bring the subject nearer home to those engaged in mercantile pursuits, the duties required from merchants' clerks in their several occupations; but the merchant, to obtain eminence, must be thoroughly acquainted with business in all its details, and have his attention directed to the mercantile transactions of all parts of the world.

He strongly impressed on the young men of the Association the importance of knowledge. The man, he observed, who did not acquire every information that lay in his power, in these days of mental advancement, speedily was distanced by his fellows and sunk into obscurity. His Lordship alluded, in the course of his address, in terms of the highest eulogy, to the exceedingly eloquent lecture he had just been listening to from the lips of the Rev. Gentleman behind him; and after having spoken for a considerable period with great animation, very much to the gratification of the audience, he sat down amid a perfect outburst of applause.

In concluding his report, we must state that, being at a great distance from the speakers, and unable to take any notes, we had to trust entirely to memory, and beg to be excused if we have not done what we should have done, had we had a better opportunity, or for any errors we have committed.

We believe that we are not wrong in stating that the Mercantile Library Association of Montreal has been honored in a manner that no Provincial literary institution has ever been before. It is a rare, if not an unprecedented occurrence, for a public man of the high attainments and holding the exalted station of the Earl of Elgin, to address in a speech of such length, to a body of young men, who are engaged in the study of the liberal arts, and to extend his patronage—and we are confident the occasion of the opening the winter course of lectures for the year 1849, will be remembered by all connected with the Mercantile Library Association of this city.

CANADIAN REFORM BILL.

From the Examiner.

Two weeks ago we laid before the public, in advance of all our contemporaries, the details of the scheme for representative reform, which is to be brought before Parliament at its next session. It will provide an addition of sixty-eight members to the present House. The necessity for this increase is obvious, and the increase of population, the increase of the number of the constituent bodies, the expansion of the one must be adjusted to the progress of the other. Besides, there are several other reasons, inseparable from a small Legislature. The Executive power has too great a chance to control the Legislature, and thus invert the natural order of things; personal influence, and the distribution of patronage. The Executive is thus enabled practically to usurp and control that power which theoretically holds it in check. Besides, there are several other reasons, where it should be. In the scheme of Government like ours, which vests all the patronage in the Executive, a corrupt or unscrupulous Ministry, in a House of only 100 members has frequent opportunities, by pursuing a system of patronage-bribery, to reverse the deliberately expressed sentiments of a majority transformed into a minority by the purchase of a Robin, the treasurer of a Prince, and the distribution and misrepresentation of three or four constituencies. So atrocious a violation of public rights could not so easily be effected in a larger House; in which the character of parties would be less evenly balanced than in the last Parliament. The numerical aspect of our present House of Assembly detracts from the importance which should attach to a Legislative body, while interests of such importance are entrusted to each individual Member, that one or two instances of betrayal of trust, may throw the majority into the hands of the very party against which they are equally so directed. No recognized or existing principle points out the precise number of inhabitants that our Member should represent. As the circumstances of a country differ, the number of inhabitants to each Parliamentary representative varies. A Bill for increasing the representation for Upper Canada passed in 1839, gave to each District containing 1000 inhabitants one representative, and to each District containing 4000 inhabitants two representatives. Owing to the increase of population this ratio of representation to population would now give to a large number of representatives. By the proposed measure, a county must contain 15,000 inhabitants to entitle it to two representatives. The ratio of representatives to population, is one which depends upon the existing circumstances of a country. It may have been very proper at one time to allow two representatives to every 4000 inhabitants; it is equally so now to raise the number to 15,000; while in the United States House of Representatives, the ratio of perfect property and a well adapted population to circumstances, in each member, 70,000 inhabitants. A reform is worthless or unwholesome if it does not adapt institutions to the condition and wants of society. A man's duties are not the same in the same society grows its institutions of capacity, the garments of the infant become useless to the full-grown man. In the successive stages of a nation's growth, frequent modifications of its institutions are required. New developments bring with them new wants. It would be equally absurd for Canada, with its present population and intelligence, to adopt a ratio of representation suited to its condition thirty years ago, or that suited to the present condition of the United States, with its 20,000,000 of inhabitants. A small number of men may manage the trifling affairs of a District, but numbers and wisdom are required to deliberate on those of a nation. There is a limit beyond which a deliberative Assembly would become unmanageable from numbers. On the other hand, there is a limit which must be attained to command attention and respect. The proposed increase of representatives involves no radical principles of reform, it is intended as a "finishing" scheme; its whole purpose being simply to adapt the representation to the present circumstances and condition of the country.

Though no fixed principle can determine the ratio of representatives to population, it is very different with the question of uniformity and equality in the numbers, which each member should represent. Representation is simply the sending of substitutes to deliberate and decide on public affairs; the personal attendance of the whole constituent body being impracticable. The theory of representation which may be regarded as perfect is that which uniformly sends a member of the Legislature three representatives of an equal number of electors. It must be a question, in every case, how far the theory is capable of being applied. Every theory is worthless if an approximation to its practical realization cannot be attained. And if absolute uniformity be attained to day, local variations in the population will destroy that uniformity tomorrow; without, however, creating striking discrepancies. Time passes; the tide of population flows unequally; and rushes into the closest approximation to the standard which it is desirable to attain should be attempted. Electoral districts, which shall be each entitled to two representatives, cannot be so formed that every one will contain 15,000 inhabitants, unless the present divisions of Counties and Districts be for Electoral purposes, erased, and those portions be made immediately after the taking of the census, to be applied to those which contain less than 15,000 inhabitants, and therefore not entitled, on the proposed plan, to send two members, may contain 12,000, or 10,000, or 8,000, or 6,000, or 4,000, or 2,000, or 1,000, or 500, or 250, or 125, or 62, or 31, or 15, or 7, or 3, or 1, or 1/2, or 1/4,
