SAVE MONEY AND GET STYLE.

Leaders!

AS MILLINERS we have won our reputation for giving a superior service for a good deal less money than we might fairly ask. Perhaps you have been getting your Millinery at other stores for years past—you have grown tired of paying high prices and not getting just what you wanted or the style that would most become you. Your order wasn't of enough importance to take pains with. We spare no pains to give you the most becoming styles, whether your purchase be great or small. Our Milliners do not slight their work—your hat is as much to them as the hat of our best customer. They put on the same artistic touches for you as for anyone else. Thus it is that those who once buy their Millinery here come again. We ask you to put us to the test—see if we cannot save you money—see if we cannot please you in every particular.

FIGHTING FOR A NAME.

CHAPTER XVI.

Four years more slipped by without any material change in the lives of our friends on Mount Vernon street. The only event of noteworthy importance was Ned's graduation from the High School, where he stood first in his class, his average being ninety-nine and a quarter per cent, while Gertrude Langmaid stood next to him at ninety-eight and three-quarters per cent.

Thus, according to the custom of the school, it lay with these two to open and close the exercises of commencement day.

"Please let Miss Langmaid take the salutatory, sir, and I will deliver the salutatory," Ned remarked when Professor George announced their standing in connection with the arrangement for the closing exercises. "Being a young lady, I should prefer to have it given to her," he chivalrously added, as he darted a smiling glance at Gertrude.

"That young lady, who, by the way, had grown wondrously fair during the last four years, flushed rosily at his words.

"I think that the honors should fall where they belong," she emphatically asserted. "Heatherton stands first in the class and no one should usurp his place."

"Well, you two must decide the matter between yourselves," the professor good-naturedly remarked; "it is immaterial to me."

"Sentiments, farewells and last words are more characteristic of the gentler sex," Ned observed, with a merry twinkle in his dark eyes that caused a ripple of laughter to run around the class, "and if it is all the same to you, Miss Langmaid, I think I would prefer the salutatory."

Gertrude knew well enough that he only said this because he did not wish to take precedence over her; but, of course, as he had her preferred the salutatory, asking it of her as a favor, she did not like to refuse him.

"Very well," she said, with an independent little toss of her bright head, "if Mr. Heatherton desires, I will agree to the exchange upon one condition, and that is, that an announcement be made regarding the facts of the case so that a wrong impression need not prevail."

"I do not think that is necessary," objected Ned.

"Miss Langmaid is right," said the professor. "You can have the salutatory, Heatherton, if you prefer, but, of course, any young lady would feel surprised."

sitive about accepting an honor which did not belong to her without explaining the situation, and so some announcement regarding your relative standing will have to be made."

"This did not quite please Ned, but the matter had to stand thus, and when the important day arrived the two young people did great honor to themselves and their class.

Mr. and Mrs. Langmaid called, in their carriage, at Mount Vernon street, to take Mrs. Heatherton and Mr. Lawson to the hall where the exercises were to be held, and all four were as proud as they well could be over the creditable appearance which their daughter made, and the high encomiums which they won for the excellence of their literary productions.

"You have a smart boy, there, Mrs. Heatherton," Mr. Langmaid remarked to that lady as he shook hands with her at the close of the exercises. "I congratulate you upon being the mother of such a son."

"Hum—well you may, sir; there isn't a smarter boy in the city of Boston," Mr. Lawson proudly asserted, while Mrs. Heatherton thanked Mr. Langmaid with tears in her eyes for the praise of Ned, and said something equally kind regarding Gertrude.

"You just did that business up in grand style," Ned whispered in a confidential aside to Gertrude, when, with her hands full of flowers, she came down from the stage after delivering her farewells to school, faculty and class. "What was that I said a dignified first-class salutatory; there wasn't the least bit of bash or maudlin sentiment about it."

"Thank you, Mr. Heatherton," Gertrude responded, flushing with pleasure. "Since I was occupying a position that did not really belong to me, I naturally felt desirous to do it well, and if you will allow me to say it, I was proud of your display of talent today."

"Were you, really?" Ned asked with an animated look.

"Yes, truly; your address was fine and full of thought."

"Much obliged," said Ned with a low bow, and—do you know of anyone I would rather hear say that; only, if you please, I would have liked it better if you had not been quite so formal about it."

"Formal!" repeated the young girl, looking surprised.

"Yes, how long is it since I became Mr. Heatherton? Must I begin to call you Miss Langmaid?" Ned inquired, with a sigh.

"No, please, don't; but somehow I thought perhaps I ought to—to," Gertrude stammered, blushed and finally gave up trying to tell what she thought she ought to do.

"You used to call me Ned until lately; we've always been good friends in the past, and—do I hope we shall be in—in the future," the young man faltered as he searched the beautiful face beside him with wistful eyes.

"Of course, why shouldn't we be? Why, if I were going to make a list of my friends, I should write your name first of all," the young girl earnestly exclaimed.

"Would you truly—Gertrude?" he eagerly breathed.

"I would, truly—Ned," she retorted, archly, and mimicking his tone, while her eyes grew luminous and the rich color surged up to her brow beneath his earnest, searching gaze. Then she added: "But there is mamma beckoning to me and I must run to my kettledrum tomorrow at five and bring Mrs. Heatherton with you," and the fair girl flitted away, leaving her companion with a radiant face, a rapidly-beating heart, and bounding pulses.

"No, I did not mean that," she softly murmured, as if recalling something from the past. "I am very glad that she is not my sister; I wonder if I ought—I wonder if I can—Yes, I will."

What he wondered if he ought and could do, and so emphatically resolved that he would accomplish, we must leave the future to reveal.

On the afternoon of the day that Ned Heatherton and Gertrude Langmaid graduated with such high honors, Mr. Lawson's attention was attracted, as he was passing up Washington street, to an open barouche, in which there were sitting an elderly couple—a gentleman and a lady—and which, even as he looked, drew up and stopped before the entrance to the Adams House.

Both lady and gentleman alighted, and entered the hotel with the air of those familiar with the place as guests.

Mr. Lawson suddenly stopped in the middle of the sidewalk, and stared blankly after them, a look of astonishment not unminged with pain written on his aged face.
