The Day Before the Wedding.

"And you have quite made up your mind to go, after all, Bryan?"

"Well, I think you will agree with me. Constance, that in duty bound I must comply with my dear old uncle's request, and spend this last week with him."

"If it must be, then, there is no game saying it. But you will no stay longer than is absolutely necessary, dearest-will you?"

And the pretty speaker looked up in her companion's face with such an elequence of appeal—a look in which love, anxiety, and fear were all so beautifully blended, that the least he could do was to imprint upon her lips a kiss of reasurance and affection.

"I shall return, all being well, this night week. I should fidget you to death, I am afraid, if I stayed here all the time. You'khow what a restless, impatient fellow I sam; and, now that our pretty little home is quite ready, I have nothing more to do, in it till you come to grace it with your presence."

Constance Willesley and Bryan Forrester were engaged to be married in a week's time. It was the 30th of March, and all preparations upen both sides were quite completed, so that nothing more remained for them to do but to wait with what patience they could till the long expected appointed day.

Mr. Willesley was a gentleman of property, living in a picturesque village in Cumberland. Constance, the pet and darling of the bouse, was his only child, and all preparations upen both sides were quite completed, so that nothing more remained for them to do but to wait with what patience they could till the long expected appointed day.

"And also, dear boy, to formally make you my heir."

"Uncle, you are too good to me!"

"You know I am what is called a rich man. Well, I have no patience with people who are rich, hoarding up their money until their death instead of doing good with it while they are alive. So I mean to give you a good round sum to start you fairly and comfortably, and prefer making pou acquainted with my intentions myself, now, to leaving it for other people, to do when I am dead."

After a little more talk on business matters, Bryan set out to look up some of his acquaintances, and to make some purchases which he had left till the present opportunity.

People coming up to London from the country always find the time pass very quickly. A week here seems but a few days; there is so much to be seen, to be heard, and to be done; and so if Bryan had tried ever so hard, he could not have hit upon a better means of employing his leat wask of hadden if a little more and weeks which immediately succeeded it were certainly among the most delight.

had tried ever so hard, he could not have hit upon a better means of employing his last week of bachelor life.

He had written almost every day to to Constance, and she had regularly replied. Now the time had come for him to bid his uncle good-bye, and take his departure for Moretown.

soon, by the motion of the train, lulled into a state of somnoience—and a young one, who, after making himself quite comfortable, proceeded to discuss the contents of the morning's paper with Bryan. However, after passing several small stations in the most approved railroad fashion, their numbers were augmented by the entrance of a young man apparently about Bryan's own age and height, dressed with great care, and wearing a coat and hat similar to his. He was accompanied his portmanteau in with him.

It was a very large and bustling station at which they got in, and so, amidst the hurry and confusion of passengers hastening hither and thither, they were not pareases of women is demonstrated by every loved him as his son; and Byran repaid his affectionate solicitude with a love both grateful and sincere.

All the skill of the ancient House-keeper, who had known him from a boy, was now put into requisition to make his room look anug and cheerful, and as much as possible as it used to do in former days; and all her culmary arts were displayed in preparing for him the dishes of which, as a school-boy—and boy of a larger growth, too—she knew him to be fond.

The meeting between uncle and nephew was most genial. There was nothing of the "old fogey" about Mr. Gregory; though eight-and-fifty summers had passed over his head, he could enter into all his nephew's plans and feelings with the zest of a true friend and sagacious adviser.

"And so, Bryan, you are going to be married," he began, the following morning, at breakfast.

"Such is my desire, uncle."

"Ay, ay; no doubt. Well, I hope you will be very happy."

"I think it will be my own fault if am not, with such a lovable girl as Constance. You must see her yourself, uncle, to form an opinion of her. Of course my judgment is based."

"When you return from the Continent, you must pay me the first visit, mind."

"When you return from the Continent, you will be charmed with the lovely lake scenery."

"And now, Bryan, do you know why I seat for your part on the plat form, to his great disappointment, he found it had just started.

To dispatch a telegram to Constance, telling her that he had been unexpectedly detained on his journey, that she was not to be alarmed, and that the ceremony was to take place as arranged the following morning, was his next business, and then there was nothing for it but to wait.

"And now, Bryan, do you know why I sent for you?"

The wedding-party are all assembled in the pretty little village church at the in the pretty little village church at the hour agreed upon, and the clergyman is waiting in readiness to perform the ceremony. But where is the bridegroom?

The question passes from one to another, and as the minutes steal on, a

It was with a light heart and heavy purse—a most desirable combination—that he took his seat in the Hansom which was to convey him to the station. A long journey lay before him, as he would not reach his destination till ten r. M.

But what of that? With very happy thoughts and plenty of money, a day's travelling may be made tolerably endurable in this age of comfort and luxury.

So soliloquised our young friend at the commencement of his journey, Little did he think what awaited him ere it should arrive at its close!

His luggage consisted only of a black leather portmanteau and an umbrella—he hated travelling with a lot of impedimenta—both of which, for very good reasons, he took into the carriage with him; and he wore a light overcoat and round felt hat.

For some distance his only fellow-travellers were an old gentleman—who was soon, by the motion of the train, lulled into a state of somnoence—and a young one who after making himself quite com-

"Here we are at last!" he exclaimed, as the train came to a stand-still, and, in his impetuosity, he was the first to issue from the carriage.

With his umbrella in one hand and portmanteau in the other, he is striding along the platform in the direction of the refreshment rooms, when two tall men. A female who may well be described as with high buttoned up coats, and helmets on their heads, placed themselves on either side of him, and while one relieves him of his umbrelia and portmanteau—which is done so suddenly and adroitly, that he has no time to resist—the other claps a pair of hand-cuffs on him.

To picture his indignation and amazement is simply impossible.

"Gracious heavens! What do you mean? Take these things off! Unloose me instantly, or I'll—I'll—"

"None of that, sir, if you please. You just come quietly along with us, and don't get making a row for everybody in the

"What do you mean by such insolence? Take me to the station-master and let me speak to him, if you won't believe me?"

"All right: this way out."

"I tell you, you have got the wrong man, and you shall pay dearly for it if you do not let me go. I appeal to this gentleman; and Bryan began his tale to to a bystander, but he, on a wiak from the poloceman, went his way without listening.
