Missionary Cabinet.

"Have you ever been at the Missionary Cabinet?"

"I never heard of it before," answers one child, "I do not know where it is."

I will tell you where it is, and you must be sure to visit it, whenever you have an opportunity. It is in the city of Boston. I care say some of the Boston Sabbath school children will be greatly surprised when they hear that, for I suppose many of them are quite ignorant of such a place. They know where the Common is, and the State House, and they may have visited the Natural History Rooms, and the New-England Museum ; but the Missionary Cabinet they have still to visit. Now I will tell you where it is, and when children from the country visit the city, they must be sure to go there, to behold the curious things which the missionaries have sent home from the heathen lands where they are at work.

"Well, but how to get there." I will tell you.

Suppose you are at the Park Street church. Every body can find that, because it is on the corner of Tremont and Park streets, opposite to the very eastern corner of the Common. Go down Tremont street by the great Tremont House, you will know it by the granite front, and granite pillars supporting the portico : then by a row of large, handsome stores, with many fine things at the windows. This is called Tremont Row. Pass along these buildings, and then you come, at the left, to a clean, wide street, going from the row up a gentle rise of ground. This is a part of Pemberton Square. As you go up on the left hand side you will see on the back side of a high building, in large letters,

" AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS."

Here is the Missionary House.

It is a very interesting sight to view these varied collections of sacred things—that is, sacred in the eyes of the heathen ; but it is also a very melancholy sight when we think of the degraded condition of the people that bend and worship such things.

In the third story of the building there is a large room set apart for the different idols and images sent to the Society from the various foreign sta-
