A FATHER'S EXPERIENCE IN TRAINING CHILDREN.
(From the Farming World).

I notice some very sensible talk from mothers in the ladies' department of your paper about the care and education of children. So far I have seen nothing from the fathers on the subject. My youngest child is eight and the oldest sixteen years of age. I can, therefore, speak from experience. Whether the knowledge of it imparted to others will profit them I cannot say. At any rate, if you will permit me a little space over in the ladies' column, I may get some good mother to give us a word of experience, and most likely I may receive any severe criticism at her hands. My course may have been wrong. It is hard for a parent to see the fault of the child, and it is often extremely difficult to tell just where the correction ought to come in, especially with the mother. In fact I have seen mothers who could or would not see scarcely a fault in some very bad children, although they were aware that their children are not as good as they might be: still they were ready to find excuses for them. To illustrate, a near relation of mine complained to me how bad and ungovernable her boys were. I ventured to agree with her, when she tossed her head to one side, cast her eye to the ceiling, and with an injured tone said: "Well, I guess they're about as good as any boy's children." Here, I imagine, were about like Mrs. Jones' dear, sweet little Tommy, who, my mother-in-law, had brought up. It is hard for a parent to see the fault of the child, and it is often extremely difficult to tell just where the correction ought to come in, especially with the mother. In fact I have seen mothers who could or would not see scarcely a fault in some very bad children, although they were aware that their children are not as good as they might be: still they were ready to find excuses for them. To illustrate, a near relation of mine complained to me how bad and ungovernable her boys were. I ventured to agree with her, when she tossed her head to one side, cast her eye to the ceiling, and with an injured tone said: "Well, I guess they're about as good as any boy's children." Here, I imagine, were about like Mrs. Jones' dear, sweet little Tommy, who, my mother-in-law, had brought up.

There is another, and here I must admit fathers are most at fault. I have seen the joyous play and chatter of children suddenly cease almost to a deathly stillness at the appearance of the father. A shake of his finger or a look, and they would shrink away to corners or disappear from his sight like scared mice. There is the severe, stately mother, too, with the keys hanging to her apron string and a switch in easy reach. Corporal punishment inflicted upon children is cruel and barbarous. Solomon's precept: "Spare the rod and spoil the child," was applicable in its day and to the people only addressed. The Jews, by their own history, were a stiff, wicked people, and never got a lick amiss. If children are to receive corporal punishment the father should never do it. His great, strong hand should never be raised for that purpose. Many children have been injured for life by a severe box on the ear or a strong jerk by the arm. If it must be inflicted, let it be always done by the mother. Having been raised by an old Virginia good mother who ruled both white and black children with precept and the birch, the many thrashings inflicted on me never did the least good, but I had a continued sense of wrong. The humiliations was to me a yoke of oppression, and increased my desire to a rebellion and waywardness. Again, the Sabbath was an unwelcome day. I was not allowed even to whistle on that day, or exercise in any sport in or out of doors. Always to eat in perfect silence, and remain silent in presence of visitors. My wife and I have revised these rules in raising our children. Up to this time they have never been subjected to corporal punishment. We allow them to talk at table in a moderate way, and to enjoy all the society that we enjoy. Visitors see as much of them as they do of the grown up ones. We make the children our companions. It is surprising to see how fast children will learn manners when constantly allowed the society of grown up people. Never talk baby talk to them, but the very best language at command. In most important business and duties to them as they grow up, and make them feel that you impose no confidence in their integrity and ability to attend to your affairs. We have not yet had to regret the manner of raising our children, though we can see that for the lack of more wisdom, we have fallen short in many things.
