CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

that quickened our imagications and made that night under the pyramics memorable; perhaps it was our deep hows of Turkish tobacco, whose incress curled about our camp a great part of the night; perhaps it was the marvel lous, bewitching atmosphere of Egypt that is spicy and invigorating and truckle with poetic legends and filled with ghosts. The day breaks suddenly in the case, and with a little warning, the sky grows gray and silvery, then the horizon all at once flushes, and out of the desert rises the great sun, a rayless disc of goal that rolls up into the heavens, and the long day is begun."

So much of prose description; but for an example of verse that is clearly from the same hand, though on a widely different theme, here is a little poem :-PREMONITION

In a still chamber, a white bed of steep With southing pillow, and a dream so deep That it alone reality did seem, And all reality was but a dream— I woke as children waken in surprise

With soft bewilderment of lips and eyes. For I had felt unon my eyelfds pressed One darling baby kiss, upon my becast A passing breath as of an ang-boying Potsing above me, fragrant, fluttering.

And then I breathed the subtle, sweet perfume Of times, purple filars in tult bloom. Littles so code and fresh, the flowers I know Just plucked, rate purple filars damp with dow.

In cestacy I to the window flew, Chaimed with the garden of my dream; but no! There coulds fell the moonlight on the snow. The snow that lay like moonlight car below.

Was it memory that chose to bring From my dream garden a forgotten flower? Was it a sort the control of the sou And welker me, with the first ment beach for opting?

In a day when poorly is not to be arrificial, and without appeal ( ) himst sense, this poem soms to each be a perfect time. Its simple to the ance tous and uncommontace hearsman trasow tratelding of the thene, a ortosmooth flow of the fines compane to the making of a poem which any sugar might be proud to own. The 's it bewill ferment of typs and eyes" is a per acfull of sweetness; and what come become describe the waking of a card ' that charming by-piece in one of sydney Lanier's poems-

"Run home, little streams With your laptais or stars and dreams"— is from the same kind of inspiration. An now for another bit of god from the mines of this Californian, who now bidenear the Potomac's waters, but whose metal is to be found at any place who e his Midas hand touches the pen. Teer is that about this poem, cated "Some One to Some Other," which haunts the

Oh, love me not, that I may long for thee; Or, loving me, show not thy love alway, For love that seeks shall weaken song for thee; But love unsought is love that's gone astray.

Love me, anon, and love will sicken me-Even thy love, the love I most desire, The want of love alone in ay quicken me, The love that kindleth may e'en quench the

Yet, it is right for me, but wrong for thee;
To breathe a fruitless prayer with bated breath
So, love me not, that I may long for thee—
Love and desire the even unto death."

Quite a different poem is that which Stedman and Hutchinson have repro duced in their "American Literature" as in licative of Mr. Stoddard's best work in verse. It is "The Cocoa Tree," and here is the initial stanza:-

Cast on the water by a careless hand, bay after day the winds persuaded me;
Onward I drifted fill a cocon tree
Stayed me among its brauches, where the sand
Gathered about me, and I slowly grew,
Fed by the constant sun and the inconstant
dew

Swinburne has pointed out the second I'ne as perfect. Without trying to make too much of my point, that the verse and prose of this writer and analogous in quality, I should like to put a cross on the margin to indicate not only the superb grouping of the seven words, but the stanza entire. This writer has always been able to live up to his blue china; by which I mean that he has been equal to the proper handling of his own thoughts. Many poets waste their material or use it crumsily. They rue the blooks of marble in the vain off at to create statues. But the artistic sense is strong in this poet of the tropies; to him the inspiration does not come without the suggestion for its proper employment. Or course there is everything in training. in familiarity with letters, and if you please, with the mechanics of composition. Happy is he to whom the Muses give not dony the yellow metal, but the molds by which to coin it.

Back in the time when I used to wait for the gods to come and inspire meperiod of adolescence now happily pass ed-I knew a youngster who received letters semi-occasionally from the author of "South Sea Idyte" and "Mashallah." It seemed to me a grand thing to know the author of a book. While I am not sure to-day about the glories of author ship, I still keep als of the writer's books near at hand; and having seen him face to face, and known the kindness of his heart (for I, too, have had letters from him), I still think it is a fine thing to know an author. There is only one fault to be found with him, and that is that he does not write enough. But I suspect that he gives so much time to his friends that he robs bimself of the hours which he might give to the making of books. And then the University is a matter which the scholar and poet takes seriously, as he takes many facts in life. He has written a sweet and reverent book to tell how and why he became a Catholic, and if a roof were needed to emphasize the fact of his line spirit and spiritual per-ceptual it is to be found in "A Troubled Heart," But to my mind the most admumb e trung about him is his appreciation of triendship, and the good cheer and winning sympathy that enter into all his dealines with those who get near to him. He is one who gives naich. He asks little, but acceives, let us hope, according to his high deserving.

To this exile from the tropic seas and the storied Nile be good and kird, O yellow Potonine!
