

INDEX OF FIRST LINES

671

	PAGE
The swiftness sound, but with a fair excuse	636
The swallows in their torpid state	621
The twentieth year is well nigh past	427
The winter night now well nigh worn away	540
The works of ancient bards divine	543
Then, whose refulgent stall, and summons clear	585
There is a bird who, by his coat	546
There is a book, which we may call	550
There is a field through which I often pass	462
There is a fountain fill'd with blood	442
There is in souls a sympathy with sounds	219
There's not an Echo round me	487
There was a time when Atha's silent fire	325
These are not dew drops, these are tears	415
These critics, who to faith no quarter grant	132
These verses also to thy praise the Nine	660
They call thee rich - I deem thee poor	544
They mock my toil - the nymphs and am'rous swains	622
Think, Delia, with what cruel haste	271
This cabin, Mary, in my sight appears	421
This cap, that so stately appears	377
This evening, Delia, you and I	272
This is the feast of heavenly wine	450
Though nature weigh our talents, and dispense	10
Though once a puppy, and though Pop by name	118
Thou hast no lightnings, O thou Just!	422
Thou magic lyre, whose fascinating sound	276
Thou mayst of double ignorance boast	523
Thracian parents, at his birth	549
Thrive gentle plant! and weave a bow'r	429
Through floods and flames to your retreat	634
Thus Italy was mov'd - nor did the chief	531
Thus says the prophet of the Turk	300
Thy country, Wilberforce, with just disdain	415
Thy mansion is the Christian's heart	463
Time, never wand'ring from his annual round	520
Time was when I was free as air	305
'Tis Folly all - let me no more be told	470
'Tis my happiness below	456
'Tis morning; and the sun, with ruddy orb	200
'Tis not that I design to rob	286
To Babylon's proud waters brought	264
To be remember'd thus is fame	426
To grass, or leaf, or fruit, or wall	560
To JESUS, the Crown of my Hope	476
To keep the lamp alive	473
To lay the soul that loves him low	502
To Mr. John Milton	582
To purify their wine some people bleed	376
To tell the Saviour all my wants	463
To those who know the LORD I speak	454
To watch the storms, and hear the sky	341
Toll for the brave	344
Too many, LORD, abuse thy grace	471
Trav'ler, regret not me; for thou shalt find	545
Tres tria, sed longe distantia sacula, vides	575
Trust me, the meed of praise, dealt thriftily	626
'Twas a long journey lay before us	721
'Twas in the glad season of spring	373
'Twas my purpose, on a day	485
Two neighbours furiously dispute	556
Two nymphs, both nearly of an age	466
Two omens seem propitious to my fame	624