THE RETURNING MEN

(George Matthews Adams.)
The other day a ship landed at an American port with 2000 Canadians aboard—every one of them wounded on the field of battle, but being returned to their native land for holiday time.
Hardly a man there was but what was seriously hurt. Not many months before they left all, offering their all like calm stoics, in the service of their country.
Fresh and full of glow they sailed away. Torn and bleeding they came back. Many tossed in great pain upon their beds as the trains sped them to their former homes.
But not a man complained. Not a man regretted. Many cheered as the tall cliffs they left loomed before them again.
What does it all mean? Perhaps this more than anything else. That the great good of all is a larger thing than the general good of our little selves. The world is bound up with an infinite form of units, of which every individual forms a unit.
So that in the last analysis of our individual selves we each stand ready to give all—for all.
