"Among the vast crowd of negroes hanging about the show was a large number who come to town expecting to get in for ten or twenty-five cents. The outside canvasman gave out a quiet tip that if any one had any change in his pockets he could get into the show at cat rates. They began to crowd around him, tendering varied amounts of money from one cent up to five. He accepted all tenders. He told them he would have to put them in one at a time. He did. "The inside man was waiting for them. Just as soon as a black head would appear under the canvas he would grab it, drag the rest of the person owing it inside and shove him out of the other side of the parrow connection. From here it was a long connection. From here it was a long way around to the man who got the money.
